BONDS FOR SALE.

Bids for Municipal Securities Amounting to $45, 000 Invited.

By advertisement published in this paper today the Mayor and Council of Oakland invite bids for the purchase of $45,000 of water works and sewerage bonds of Oakland, bearing date June 1st, 1909, and to be in the denomination of $1000 each, bearing interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, the first of the series to be due and payable two years from the date of issue and thereafter one bond each succeeding year.

The securities to be offered by the municipality were authorized by an Act of the Legislature of 1908 and ratified by a vote of the people at the succeeding spring electron, the proceeds to be used in building and equipping a water and sewerage system for the town.

The bids will be opened on May 18th, at two o'clock p. m., the council reserving the right to reject any and all proposals.

The bonds to be issued are considered excellent investments.

The B. & O. R. R. Co. have commenced extensive improvements to the road between Piedmont and Altamont. They are laying new steel rails from Piedmont to the top of the 17-mile grade and a large number of extra track men have been employed. Many other improvements will be made to the road bed and several of the sharp curves will be taken out of this long grade.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel C. Bond, of DuBois, Pa., arrived at Bond yesterday evening to spend their honeymoon, being guests of the bridegroom's brother, Mr. N. U. Bond. Mr. Bond is cashier of the DuBois National Bank and president of the First National Bank at Brockwayville, Pa. His bride is a charming lady and a reigning belle of DuBois. From Bond the couple will go South before returning to their home.

Mr. R. C. McCandlish, of Friendsville, has become a fancier of the finer breeds of chickens and in this paper today advertises the sale of eggs for setting and also chickens of several varieties. His pens contain thoroughbred Columbian Wyandottes, Buff Leghorns, White Wyandottes and Barred Plymouth Rocks. If interested it will be to the advantage of chicken raisers and breeders to communicate with Mr. McCandlish.

In today's REPUBLICAN will be found the statement of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada, of which Mr. W. H. Bowers, who recently moved to Oakland from Crellin, is the local representative. The statement of Mr. Bowers' company shows a wonderful growth in its Maryland business over that of the preceding years which is attributed to the prompt action of the company in paying accrued claims and in looking after the welfare of its policyholders. Mr. Bowers will be pleased to discuss life insurance with anyone who is interested if they will communicate with him.

Mr. Phil B. Gough, of Mountain Lake Park, who was recently employed as store manager of the Croft Lumber Company, the Garrett county corporation which will soon begin the manufacture of lumber at Alexander, West Va., will leave for that place some time this week to take charge of the mercantile department of the lumber concern. Already more than two hundred men are at work laying the railroad and building the mill and other structures on the property of the company. The manufacture of lumber will probably begin in a month or two, when about five hundred men will be employed.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Hinebaugh, who have been residents of Oakland for the past twelve years, will sell their household goods at public auction at their home on West Centre street Saturday, April 17th, and in the future will reside with their children at various points in Maryland and West Virginia. At present the couple are being visited by their two daughters, Mrs. Richard Connell, of Morgantown, and Mrs. T. S. Claggett, of Hagerstown, and by their son Mr. Playford Hinebaugh, of Pittsburg. By the removal of Mr. and Mrs. Hinebaugh from Oakland the town will lose two of its best and highest respected residents.

The Oakland Normal School opened Monday with an enrollment of more than fifty students. Tuesday the day closed with fifty-seven on the roll which number has been somewhat augmented since.

Mt. Lake Reunion.

The committee to arrange the program for the Lutheran Reunion at Mt. Lake Park, met at the parsonage in Westernport, Monday, March 22. It was decided to hold the reunion early in August and the Rev. Dr. Charles E. Albert, of Philadelphia, was selected as the speaker—if he can be procured—and the subject upon which main emphasis will be placed will be the Lutheran church—her Sunday school and and Young People's Work. This promises to be the most successful reunion we have yet held at this place, and all should arrange to be there The Sunday schools, including the Primary Departments, should turn out in large numbers and make this a general picnic excursion. The Lutheran choir of Oakland has been asked to furnish the vocal music.—The Young Lutheran.

HIS EYE KNOCKED OUT.

Frank Bolden, Formerly of Oakland, Met With Serious Mishap.

At Meyersdale, Pa., last Saturday Frank Bolden, a native of Oakland but for a number of years a resident of Meyersdale, where he is a well known carpenter, met with an accident which will render him partially blind.

Mr. Bolden was engaged in repairing a spring on one of the doors of the Colonial Hotel at Meyersdale when the strong coil, under heavy tension, by some means became unloosened, the end or point striking the unfortunrte man in the face, tearing his left eye from the socket. He was hurried to Cumberland by Dr. W. T. Rowe and taken to a hospital but the eye could not be saved.

MR. HANNA CHAIRMAN

Republicans Organize For State Campaign.

The Republican State Central Committee met at the Hotel Rennert, Baltimore, on Wednesday. Mr. John B. Hanna, of Harford, was unanimously elected Chairman and Treasurer, as was Mr. George A. Davis, of Washington county, secretary. There was present the largest gathering of representative Republicans in years and the night before the meeting the lobby of the Rennert was crowded. The election of a Chairman to succeed Mr. Thomas Parran aroused the greatest interest. Mr. Parran had the support of ex-Congressman Jackson, National Committeeman Wm. P. Jackson, Congressman Mudd, Collector Goldsborough, and their friends, while Mr. Hanna had the support of Collector Stone, R. A. Ravenscroft, C. C. Pusey, Congressman Pearre's friends and Lloyd Lowndes, in Western Maryland, Albert G. Towers and Thomas M. Bartlett and their friends on the Eastern Shore, Robert Garrett and O. E. Weller, of Baltimore county, and the active aid of Edward M. Allan, John A. Robinson, Albert B. Twining, Robert J. Gilbert, Members of the State Central Committee for Harford; Senator Baker and Mr. Richard Dallam. The strength of the two sides as shown before the meeting was Hanna 77, and Parran 51. When this situation was realized Mr. Parran gracefully retired and the election of Mr. Hanna was unanimously made, Mr. Parran not allowing his name to be presented. It was decided to secure legal advice concerning the new primary election law and after this is done the Chairman will call the Committee together to name a date for the State Convention and for the primaries. The thanks of the Committee was extended to the retiring Chairman and Secretary.

The following resolutions were offered by Mr. D. W. Baker, of Montgomery county, and were unanimously adopted:

Be it resolved by the Republican State Central Committee of Maryland:

1. The committee congratulates the people of this State and of the United States that they have elected and placed at the head of the nation that wise, and altogether admirable statesman, William Howard Taft. Under his leadership the great Republican party, of whose organization we are a part, will continue to demonstrate to the world that in all those national activities which make for peace and prosperity within our own borders, and for the general betterment of mankind at large, the United States of America will be foremost.

2. We congratulate the people of Maryland that at the late election a substantial majority of this state cast their votes in favor of President Taft. That only two of Maryland's electoral votes were cast in accordance with the will of the majority of our people was due to the outrageous election laws and machinery conceived and put into execution by the Democratic party organization, for the purpose of nullifying the votes of a large portion of the State's electorate.

3. In desperate hope of finally fastening upon the state permanent control by their organization the Democratic party has prepared for submission to the voters at the next election a constitutional amendment, the sole and avowed purpose of which is to disfranchise a vast army of our native and foreignborn voters. The proposed constitutional amendment, and the election laws under whose operation the voice of the people is now stifled, the Republican State Central Committee condemns and denounces as machinery, by which an unscrupulous cotorie of Democratic partisans hope to irrevocably fasten their hold on the State of Maryland.

4. In order that the people of the State may be fully and accurately informed of the effect of the proposed constitutional amendment and of the present election laws, the chairman of this committee is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a committee of Republicans, one for each Congressional district of the State to prepare an address to the people, advising them how their rights are and will be affected by the present and proposed legislation.

5. In view of the fact that some of the provisions of the Republican party constitution have been found impracticable and out of date, the chairman of this committee is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a committee of Republicans, selecting one for each Congressional district, members of this committee, to prepare such amendments to the Constitution as may be deemed expedient, and said committee to report to the next State convention.

6. In order that the Republicans of Maryland may be, so far as possible, fully protected in the enjoyment of their legal right in relation to elections and matters of a political nature, the chairman of this committee is hereby authorized and directed to effect such an orginization of legal advisers as may, in his judgment, be sufficient to carry out the purposes herein mentioned.

MARYLAND SEEKS NEW INDUSTRIES

Governor's Commission Discusses Plans.

The first meeting of the commission appointed by Governor Crothers to consider the problem of bringing industrial and manufacturing plants to Baltimore was held at the executive offices in the Union Trust Building Wednesday afternoon. State Senator Charles P. Coady is chairman.

Gov. Crothers was unable to attend the meeting because of an engagement in Annapolis, but expressed great interest in the work of the commission and will wait for its recommendations.

Mr. DeWarren H. Reynolds, of Cumberland, and Mr. Thomas G. Boggs, secretary of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, were the only other members of the commission present, but the work was taken up vigorously and definite results are expected.

Senator Coady told the commission that he thought aside from the main point of bringing new industries to Maryland the proposition of fostering those that are here should not be forgotten. In this he met with the approval of his colleagues. It was stated that the best scheme practicable would be to amend laws to meet present conditions making Maryland's plants the models of their kind.

The following definite ideas were formulated as a basis on which to work:

That Maryland at present has not anywhere near the manufactories she should have.

That the natural facilities in Maryland afford innumerable reasons and attractions for the establishment of industries.

That such being the the case the reason for the non-establishment of industries here must be due to a man-made situation and condition.

It developed during the discussion of the plans for action that all three of the men thought that Baltimore was unsurpassed as to its natural facilities, notably its water and rail transportation, labor and accessibility. The Chesapeake Bay, the great railroads and the innumerable other smaller methods of transportation offer an unlimiied field in that respect.

Regarding labor, it was stated during the discussion, that conditions in Maryland are pronounced the best for the reason that the operatives of plants are of a better class, live under better social conditions and are useful citizens of the State. Maryland's accessibility is patent, a look at the map being sufficient.

With this hopeful outlook as to natural advantages to offer the commission then talked of the burden of taxation, freight rates and other expenses which a corporation would have to bear in this State in comparison to that in other States. It was agreed that Maryland repels industries by its system of taxation.

While it is entirely too early to forecast what recommendations the commission may make, it is thought that the most serious one will be that of outlining an entirely new system of taxation which will make it attractive to firms to settle here.

IF First Officer John Stephens had not been far more interested in the problem of his escape from Valparaiso, where his life was in imminent danger, than in the subject of long lost treasure in the Antarctic ocean, or of a pretty woman, he would——

IF Lady Darlington, wife of a distinguished Earl, had been seeking an adventure and a love affair, she would certainly not have chosen the method which she did, but——

IF When the opportunity for escape was presented to John Stephens he had known just what was in store for him he would undoubtedly have refused, but——

IF You want to get the answer to all of these problems you have but to read our new serial, which we promise you will be a thriller, but of the highest type of literature as well. It is "The Last Voyage of the Donna Isabel," by Randall Parrish, the master craftsman of all American literary workers.

Watch for the opening chapters. They will appear in the near future.

When Marshal Bernadotte was offered the Swedish throne Napoleon bitterly opposed the idea. It was a simple answer which quelled the emperor's antagonism: "What!" said Bernadotte, "would you have me kneel to him yourself and refuse a crown?"

Confounded Napoleon.

Perfectly Clear.

"It's dish-u-way, sah," explained old Brother Swank to a befuddled friend: "Orthodoxy am de doxy dat I makes muhse'f—dat I's de orthor of, yo' un'erstand. The MOUNTAIN PRINCESS.

By JEROME SPRAGUE.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

Far up on the mountain Leslie heard her singing, and he smiled as he recognized a song that he had taught her.

She was still singing as she danced down the broad aisles of the forest toward a little stream where he was fishing.

"You look like a dryad," Leslie said, "in that gray green gown, but dryads don't sing songs from the latest musical comedy."

"It's a pretty song," she said gravely, "and I should like to see the comedy."

"If you will let me take you to town you can see everything," he informed her.

She laughed. "That's the seventh time in seven days that you have asked me to marry you. And I will always tell you that I am wedded to the mountains."

"You are wedded to an idea. You think that you can be happy all your life living up here, but you can't."

"You think I should be happier with you?"

"I know it," he said eagerly.

She shook her head.

"But I shouldn't be free. Here I am mistress of my own domain. There is no one but old Aunt Dolly and Uncle Fred to consider, and as long as they have a comfortable fireside and the magazines and novels that I order from town they are content. And my servants are the mountain people. For the rest, I have the birds and the bees and the butterflies."

Leslie's eyes twinkled. "And how long have you lived alone with the birds and the butterflies?"

"Since May," she told him.

"And now it is October. What of the winter days that are coming, when the birds fly south and the butterflies die and the bees lie close in the hollow trees?"

"Then there will be the beauty of the dead forests and the snow on the mountain side and the winter skies and the freedom."

He smiled at her. "That means so much to you—freedom."

She nodded. "If you had known my life as a child. Mother was so unhappy. She was always afraid that my father would take me away from her—they were separated, you know. And so we were always hiding, always shut in. And after she died I was sent to a school in a big city and lived all of my girlhood behind high walls.

"SO THE LITTLE WILD BIRD CAME BACK TO HER CAGE."

"When I became my own mistress I bought a bungalow out here, and because I had lived always under strict rules I said that I would live without any—that I would not even enter the bondage of matrimony—and until you came I was as free as a bird."

"And now you are not free?" He put the question eagerly.

Her grave eyes met his steadily. "No," she said; "you—you have made me question. I am very happy when I am with you, fishing or learning songs or hearing you tell of your travels. And sometimes it seems to me that is the greater happiness.

"But when I am alone I think of the city where you would take me and that you would have a right to say whether I should go or come, and I feel as if I were again behind high walls."

Her eyes were dark with a queer kind of terror.

"Poor little wild bird," said Leslie tenderly; "they kept you caged too long."

He made her sit down beside him while he led the conversation cheerfully into other channels, and after a time he taught her more songs, and their voices rang out melodiously in the still October air. And all about them was the glory of autumnal coloring, the red and gold and green of the mountain side, with a sapphire sky above.

And when their song was finished Leslie said, "Tomorrow I am going home."

She caught her breath quickly. "Tomorrow?"

"Yes; at half past 10 at night. Will you wave me farewell?"

"You go by the river road?"

"Yes."

"I will be on my porch," she promised. "You can see me in the moonlight."

He took her hand and for a moment stood looking down at her. Then he said softly: "I shall not try to tell you how hard it is for me to go without some hope. Perhaps some day you will feel differently."

Again the frightened look came into her eyes. "No—no. If you knew how unhappy my mother was—my father was cruel"—

He dropped her hands. "And you think," he began, "that I might be?"

"Oh, no, no!" she protested. "But you would have the right to say what I should do. You would be—my master."

"Little child," he commanded, "look at me."

And when her eyes met his wonderingly he said slowly: "Love like mine asks nothing but your happiness. As my wife you would be free, for, after all, that woman is the freest who lives within the circle of her husband's love."

But she shook her head. "I can't feel that way," she murmured. "I wish I could."

The next night as Leslie's horse picked its way carefully down the winding road it reared a little when a white figure came out of the bushes.

"I couldn't bear to wave goodby so far away," the girl faltered as he dismounted and stood beside her. Her face was very pale in the moonlight, and her hair shone like gold. "And then there is something that I want to say."

A light came into his eyes as he bent over her. "Tell me," he whispered.

"I love you," she said simply, but shook her head at his eager exclamation. "But I cannot marry you—not now. It would not be right—not while I have this fear of the city. But I want to ask if—if—some day I feel differently—if I should send for you—would you come?"

"From the ends of the earth," he declared. "But if it could only be now, dear heart."

The tears were on her cheeks. "I can't promise," she sobbed. "Something seems to hold me back. But I could not let you go without telling you that I cared."

All that winter Leslie waited for his summons, so secure was he in her ultimate need of him. But the winter passed and the spring, and the summer came again and the fall, and once more the woods were red and gold and green, and still he had heard nothing from her.

And one day he said to himself: "I must go to her. Surely if she loves me she will say 'Yes.'"

It was raining as he ascended the mountain, and the leaves were sodden under the horse's feet. Fear seemed to clutch at his heart as he came to the bungalow, where a single spot of light shone out through the gathering darkness.

He crept to the window and gazed in and saw her sitting before her big fire alone, a little wasted figure in a white gown.

It seemed as if his heart stopped beating as he hurried through the hall and came into the room where she sat.

"Dear," he said, and she stood up, with a little cry, and then his arms were about her, and she was sobbing wildly.

"Then why didn't you send for me?" he demanded.

"Because I couldn't ask you to marry me when I was ill and ugly, when I would not when I was well, could I?" she asked. "I took cold last winter, and then there was pneumonia, and now they keep me shut in. All summer and all the spring and fall I have watched from the windows. I knew if you came you would set me free, but I couldn't write and burden you with my woes."

"In sickness and in health," he quoted—"isn't that what they say in the marriage service, dear? And now listen. You are to get well at once. We will go to the desert, and we will live in the sunshine, and we will start tomorrow."

She smiled up at him. "How good it seems," she said, "to hear you say it so masterfully! If you knew how I have longed for some one to carry me off."

And a month later as she sat in front of her tent on the dry plain and the wind ruffled her hair and brought the pink of returning health to her cheeks her husband said, "So the little wild bird came back to her cage."

She shook her head and reached out her hand to him. "Ah, no," she said, and her voice thrilled with the wonder of her happiness. "Ah, no, but the little wild bird found her mate."

English as She Is Uttered.

"What is the cabbage?" inquired the departing patron, who wished to go to the railway station from the hotel.

"What's the what?" exclaimed the clerk, losing his clutch on the perfect English he usually handed over the counter.

"What's the cabbage? I said."

"I know you did, but I do not quite get your meaning."

"Oh, you don't? You know what cabbage is, don't you?"

"I guess I've seen enough of it to know. I used to live in the suburbs of Chicago."

"Well, what is it from here to the depot?"

"I suppose it is just what it is everywhere else—that is, a vegetable which"—

The departing patron interrupted with violence.

"Aw, say," he protested, "you ought to be plowed under or fertilized or something. Cabbage is cab fare, ain't it?"—Lippincott's Magazine.

Modern Ambition.

"If you are a real good boy and study hard, perhaps when you grow up you can become president."

"I don't want to be president."

"Why, Johnny, I am surprised. Every boy should aspire to that position."

"Not for me."

"Why not?"

"Oh, I'd rather be catcher in a league team. It's lots more fun; besides, you don't have to be good when you are a boy to get to be that."

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 9:1-19. Memory verses, 15, 16.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"He fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?"—Acts 9:4.

TIME.—36 A. D., according to Hastings' Bible Dictionary. McGiffert places Saul's conversion in 31 (hardly possible); Ramsay, 33; Thatcher, 34; Rendall, Lewin, and most earlier authorities, 37.

PLACE.—Near Damascus, the capital of Syria, 140 miles north of Jerusalem. It is situated on two beautiful rivers, the Abana and Pharpar (2 Kings 5:12).

Comment and Suggestive Thought.

We have now completed the first three divisions of our year's studies, the growth of the church (1) in Jerusalem, (2) in Samaria, (3) in all Judea. The rest of the year we shall be occupied with Paul, who was chiefly instrumental in extending the church over the world. Let us first take a general view of this great man.

He was named Saul after the first king of the Hebrews. Paul, a Roman name meaning "Little," came to him from his Roman citizenship, and was probably used from boyhood along with "Saul." It first appears at Cyprus, as he begins his missionary journeys into the Roman provinces of Asia Minor, where "Saulos" would mean "Waddling," but "Paulus" would be a familiar and patrician name. A very natural change.

Paul was born in Tarsus, at the northeast corner of the Mediterranean. It was the chief city of Cilicia, on the Cydnus, ten miles from the sea. Paul declared it "no mean city" (Acts 21:39). It "stood before the world at the entrance to the greatest province of the east as a metropolis, a free city with a free harbor, anistress of a large and fertile territory."—Hastings' Bible Dictionary. Its university rivaled those of Athens and Alexandria. It was governed largely by philosophers, some of the greatest of whom Paul probably heard. Tarsus is now "a wretched town of the Turkish style, retaining not a trace of its former splendor."—Ramsay.

His parents (whose names are unknown) were strict Pharisees, Jews of pure descent, but Roman citizens,—a fact implying distinction and wealth (Phil. 3:5; Acts 23:6). Paul's "manners were those of a citizen of the world, familiar with the habits of good society."—McGiffert. When Paul became a Christian, he was probably disowned and cast off (Phil. 3:8); he was poor, and supported himself by tentmaking. In Caesarea and Rome he appeared to possess means and to be regarded as a man of distinction, so that it is thought that he had by that time inherited from his father's estate.

He was educated as a strict Jew. If family abhorred Grecian learning, a would not send Saul to the University of Tarsus, though his writings show that he absorbed much of Greek culture. When a lad of twelve or thirteen he was sent to Jerusalem (Acts 22:3; 5:34), where his teacher was Gamaliel, grandson of Hillel, the last of the famous Jerusalem rabbis. The Jews called Gamaliel "the Beauty of the Law," and generally revered him. He seems to have had a liberal spirit, and there is a tradition of his conversion to Christianity.

Paul said that his enemies said of himself (2 Cor. 10:10), that his "bodily presence" was "weak, and his speech contemptible." He was probably short, and had some personal defect, such as limping, or weak eyes. At Lystra, however, he was compared to the eloquent and vigorous god Mercury, and he certainly had the power of commanding mobs and of winning friends even among the most hostile.

He was deeply religious, whole-souled, ardent, energetic, persevering, broad-minded, affectionate, lovable. He was great in more ways, probably, than any other man of human history. He was a great traveler, a great author, a great orator, a great organizer, a great missionary, a great philosopher. All of this genius was yielded in absolute consecration to Jesus Christ. He is the Moses of the New Testament, and the two stand supreme among men. He led the Christian church out from the bondage of a narrow Judaism into world-sympathies and world-relationships, and so became the human fulfillment of the highest thought of Christ for men.

Some of the indications that Paul's eyes never recovered their full vision are his failure to recognize the high priest when brought before him (Acts 23:5). The saying (Gal. 4:13-15), that the Galatians "would have plucked out their own eyes and given them to him." The use of an amanuensis when he was poor. The signing of his epistles in "large letters" (Gal. 6:11). It is probable that this dimness of sight was the "thorn in the flesh" against which Paul prayed so fervently (2 Cor. 12:7). It must have been a terrible handicap to a spirit so eager and active as his.

"Conversion" means "turning." It implies turning from something, and to something else. Paul, as we h seen, turned (1) from pride (intellectual and spiritual) to lowliness, a humble following of Jesus and co-operation with other Christians; (2) from violent opposition to Christ, to the boldest and most persistent testimony for Christ; (3) from a life of authority and ease, to a life of persecution and suffering; (4) from the emptiness of worldly wisdom, to the unfailing guidance of the Holy Spirit; (5) from the weakness of worldly power, to the invincible strength of the Spirit.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA

Hunting the Hippopotamus

By Frederick R. Toombs

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

LONELY remnant of once proud masters of the wilderness, the African rhinoceros has inherited the consuming desire to avenge persecution of long lines of ancestors, leading back to remote ages. So he has become the implacable enemy of man, of fellow jungle dwellers and of himself. He is the bullheaded pugilist of the unknown depths, and he will try his muscle against any living thing, growing fat on the lust of deadly combat.

Equipped by nature with a protecting hide tougher than leather and inches deep, with muscles like steel bands, with bone to carry overpowering weight, with legs that have trip hammer force, a neck like the prow of a battering ram, fear inspiring horns that rip and tear toughest anatomies, the rhino presumably realizes that he was predestined to be a fighter pure and simple, and it is his chief business to see that the designs of nature are not thwarted.

Undoubtedly Mr. Roosevelt and his party would greatly pride themselves if they could bring down a white square jawed rhinoceros, formerly found quite frequently in some remote sections of Africa, but now practically extinct. Some authorities state that the white rhino is the modern type of unicorn, though the unicorn as pictured was a comparatively small and very agile creature. While he had a horn on his head, he had almost nothing in common with the white rhino, even if he ever existed outside of the realm of the heraldry experts.

The black rhinoceros is the species invariably met in East Africa, and, unlike the Asiatic relative, he has no tusks to supplement his horns in an attack. Hunters look for him as he leaves his forest or jungle lair to eat leisurely on his way down the trail he has made to his watering place.

Rhinos leave their hidden retreats about 4 in the afternoon, a fashionable hour for promenading with the jungle ladies. Arriving at the drinking place at about dark, they go to their favored thorn feeding grounds, where they stay until morning. Acacia and mimosa twigs are rhino delicacies. They scrape the lower parts of these trees clean with their horns, the front horn being kept pointed and with a knife-like blade by sharpening it on hard substances. The horns are not bone, but of closely packed horny fibers growing from the skin and connected with massive muscles. They are not fastened to the bone of the head or snout, but do not lack effectiveness on that account.

The execution done with these horns is impressive. The celebrated hunter Oswell was in a part of East Africa, near the Uganda boundary, which was alive with game. His mount was a favorite hunting horse. Seeing at some distance a large white rhinoceros with an uncommonly long horn, he rode toward it. The animal noticed him when he was about a hundred yards distant and began at once to advance toward him slowly, but threateningly. His horse stopped and stood as if petrified. When within a few yards the rhinoceros made a dash forward, making a violent assault on rider and mount. Oswell regained consciousness on the back of a strange horse which was being led by one of his native servants. The rhinoceros had driven its horn through his leg and through his horse's body and had so completely upset both horse and rider that Oswell himself had been knocked senseless by a blow from his falling stirrup iron. Oswell's horse was killed, and the great hunter himself was kept prostrate by his wounds for several months. Even slight wounds are very slow to heal in the African climate.

The natives prize the rhino's horns dearly. They make cups from them, which, they say, betray the presence of any poison in drinks. A well known German writer says, "If poisoned wine is put into a rhinoceros horn cup, the cup will instantly split wide open." The horn shavings are saved by the natives as an infallible for convulsions and a dozen other diseases. They eat the rhino's hump as a rare delicacy.

Rhinos use these horns with appalling effect on the unprotected abdomens of men and beasts alike. Carl Lohse, professional big catcher for dealers, tells of a thrilling encounter with an African rhino.

"There is a particular class of trained men who go after rhinoceros," says Mr. Lohse. "They must be expert trackers and fully acquainted with the habits of the huge, dangerous beasts they attack.

"An infuriated rhinoceros is literally 'blind with rage.' He puts his head down and runs in a bee line, knocking down everything that gets in his way. If there was a stone wall in front of him he would smash right up against it. Some of my native hunters wounded a female rhinoceros one day when the brute ran off. The men were securing her young when she suddenly stopped and rushed toward them. The hunters were taken completely by surprise. One of them was caught by her horn and thrown over twenty feet in the air. He dropped to the ground a corpse, for the rhinoceros had disemboweled him, her horn cutting him as cleanly as a surgeon's knife."

THE TWO HORNED RHINOCEROS.

Clumsy looking as the great brute is, Gordon Cumming, the daring big game hunter, says "a horse and rider can rarely manage to overtake it." Another famous African adventurer writes, "He is not often pursued on horseback and chiefly because his speed and endurance are such that it is very difficult to come up with him, to say nothing of the danger attendant upon such a course."

Probably every one knows of the singular attendant which the rhinoceros has. It is a little bird called by ornithologists Buphaga africana and known to hunters as the rhinoceros bird, or the "indicator bird." This little fellow clings to the animal's hide by means of its long claws and elastic tail, feeding on the insects that infest the leathery skin. In doing this it renders great service to the huge brute, but a trifling one as compared to its other duty. It acts as sentinel to warn its movable feeding place of approaching danger. While it is eating it is ever on the alert, and at the earliest sign of the hunter it flies in the air, uttering its warning note, which is ever quickly heeded, the rhinoceros starting off at once in the direction taken by its watchful friend. Mr. Cumming states that when the rhinoceros is asleep and the bird, hearing the approach of the hunter, fails to awaken him by its voice it will arouse him by picking the delicate inside of his ear.

The thick hide and the small brain of the rhinoceros render him difficult to kill with a rifle. Some of these animals when slain are found to have from two to seven or eight heavy bullets under their skins, which they may have carried for years. The small brain is very difficult to reach with a bullet because of a thick, bony formation that surrounds it, so the wise marksman usually aims at the chest, so as to penetrate the lungs, or at the back of the neck to sever the vertebrae, causing the heavy head to sag low down with its own weight. Sudanese await a favorable opportunity in a melee with a rhino and sever the vertebrae with a dextrous sword thrust or hamstring him, cutting the tendons of both hind legs. As a rhino, like a hippo, can make good progress on three legs, double hamstringing is necessary.

African natives, having no firearms, have a singular way of hunting the rhino. They dig a hole near a tree to which they know he comes regularly. Over the hole they lay a bamboo trap which looks like a spokeless wheel. Over the trap they lay a noose, and to the other end of the noosed rope they tie a log weighing 300 or 400 pounds. When the rhinoceros comes to his favorite tree he gets his foot in the trap, and when he struggles to pull his foot out he draws tight the noose. He then makes off at a gallop, dragging the log. The natives track him by means of the marks which the log leaves, and when, tired out, he lies down to rest scores of them attack him with spears.

Surprisingly quick on his feet, the rhino would be doubly dangerous if his eyesight were not poor and his range of vision limited pretty much to straight ahead. Hunters of quick wit have on numerous occasions saved themselves by making a quick turn to one side from his path, escaping his vision. And blindly ahead charges Mr. Rhino, in such a rage that on striking a tree head-on he has been known to halt and lunge at it so heavily that he has broken his own neck. Oft, on a savage quest of balm for wounded feelings, he has charged at a caravan, going through it from one end to another, scattering white men, natives, ponies and baggage in every direction, and as suddenly disappearing, in snorting glee, into the hidden recesses of his haunts.

An Englishman who recently returned from an African exploring expedition relates that on a starry night when in camp a tremendous noise was heard in a neighboring thicket. As he jumped to his feet a rhino bull fourteen feet long plunged through the askaris on guard, came through the small herd of cattle the party had, broke the backs of two cows, gored a pony to death, collided with a terrified cook, throwing him high in the air, landing thirty feet distant, and with a final effort demolished the tent from which the leaders of the expedition had precipitately fled a moment before. Of a sudden the rhino was gone in the darkness, several shots, hastily fired, having no effect.

A seasoned forester, who procured dangerous animals for years in Africa for Barnum's circus, tells the writer that he would rather tackle a lion or an elephant any day than a rhino.

"I captured Barnum's first rhinoceros, and that animal cost him more than any four lions or tigers he ever owned," the hunter said. "I sent home lions, giraffes, elephants, buffaloes and hyenas, but it was a whole year before I got my first rhinoceros. The natives had killed one occasionally, but such a thing as capturing one alive had never been heard of.

"After failing to make a noose strong enough to hold a rhino my next move was to seek a point on a path several miles from camp and erect a barricade. This barricade ran to a V shaped point and was made strong enough to hold an elephant. If a rhinoceros took that path he would follow it to the last inch, and when in close quarters we would be on hand to tangle him up. When a rhinoceros appeared at the barricade he halted to sniff the air. Then he lowered his head, charging down the path.

"I thought we had him, but he struck the logs and rocks at the point of the V with the power of a wild locomotive and battered through, leaving blood and chunks of his hide on every side.

"I hadn't been in Africa very long when I found out that the elephant played second fiddle. We were hiding at a water hole one day to watch the direction taken by a troop of nine elephants when a bull rhino appeared. He stood in the open and took a long survey of the elephants. As they caught sight of him they crowded together as if alarmed. The rhino got ready and with a loud snort came charging down. Among the nine was an elephant almost as big as was Jumbo, a phenomenon among African elephants. The rhinoceros made directly for the big fellow, struck him on the left shoulder, knocked him into the pool and fell over him. The other elephants ran away, and, though the big fellow ought to have been able to overcome a pair of rhinos, he ran away from this one, closely pursued.

"On one occasion we had captured a cub lion in a pit and were engaged in getting him into a cage. Within half a mile of our camp a lion, a lioness and a cub had lain up in a thicket for the day. Our captive was of this family, and his loss put them in a fighting mood. A roaming rhino got their scent, and our people saw him charge into the thicket. There was a row as he uncovered the lions, and he emerged in chase of the lioness and the cub, while the lion was on his back seeking to claw him. He brushed his rider off against a limb and then drove the three far out of the neighborhood."

HIGH SCHOOL ESSAYS

Those Read By Messrs. White and Skinner at the Commencement.

As indicated in these columns last week we publish below the papers read at the High School Commencement by two of the graduates, Messrs. Mark Sherman White and Dean Cook Skinner, the paper immediately following being that of Mr. White. Mr. White's essay was entitled "Knowledge Is Power," the essayist saymg:

Knowledge is certain perception; a term associated with the greatest problems and controyersies of philosophy. It is the perception of the external or material world, the nature of belief, the ultimate analysis of a proposition or judgment. All of these are involved in the discussion of what is meant by knowledge. Moreover, we may in connection with this word take up the consideration of thought or intelligence, in contrast to the feelings and volition.

In a still different phase of meaning, we may be led to consider the nature of science or philosophy, which is a species of knowledge distinguished by the two features of generalized, as distinct from individual or particular facts, and being verified or attested by careful evidence, in contrast to loose assertions which satisfy the ordinary mind of mankind.

The term knowledge also includes the possession of the mind derived through its several activities of sense.perception, understanding, and speculation insofar as the same relates to truth. It should be distinguished from mere feeling and from opinion or impression.

Knowledge implies the exercise of discrimination and comparison in regard to ideas, noting their agreement and disagreement.

When the Ego perceives itself as having feeling, it becomes conscious, and understanding takes the place of simple feeling. Therefore, we may say that knowledge implies conviction reached by the perception of materials and conditions.

Most great poets have been men of very great knowledge; some have gathered it from books, as Spencer and Milton; others from keen observation of men and their surroundings, as Homer and Shakespeare.

"Knowledge is power" is an old saying which has come down to us through many generations, and which though it has been disputed by modern pedagogists is still true as it was when first spoken. If it were not true then the ordinary laborers on our railroads would possess the same degree of power as the president of the road. If knowledge were not power the private soldiers of our army and the ordinary sailors on our war-ships would compete favorably with their able commanders.

Yes, if knowledge were not power there would not be the vast difference of ability between the men and women of the factories and mines and their respective overseers and presidents. But knowledge is power; therefore, they must remain as ordinary laborers until they have obtained sufficient knowledge of the various industries to be able to hold the controlling offices.

Again, if knowledge were not power, Napoleon would never have posessed the great commanding influence he obtained by his vast knowledge of men and warfare. Had it not been for the knowledge the commander of the American fleet possessed, the result of the engagement in Santiago harbor in '98 would have been far different; but it was because of the conception of seamanship of the American Commander and his subordinates, and the lack of it possessed by the Spaniards of cannonading that won the victory for us.

It was George Washington's knowledge of warfare that obtained for us our independence in 1776; it was Franklin's diplomacy that won for us the much valued aid of France.

In the war of 1812 it was Perry on Lake Erie who showed to the world that although this was a young nation it had a very good knowledge of fighting. Likewise it was Lincoln's knowing what to do and when to do it, that saved the nation in the early sixties. It was Admiral Dewey with his intelligent experience of naval tactics won for us the victory over the Spaniards in the war of eighteen hundred and ninety-eight; and it was Ex-Pres. Roosevelt's knowledge of statesmanship that kept this nation from a costly war with Japan in nineteen hundred and eight.

And now, my friends, in summing up all these statements, what conclusions have we reached? Or we may ask, "Why is it that this country is dotted from north to south and from east to west with school houses?" Why is it that the Government has schools in which to give the coming generation a greater knowledge of all the essential branches? Or why it is that millions of dollars are spent annually for the maintenance of schools? It is because of the great necessity for an educated citizenship. Washington in his farewell address, said, "In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion it is esssntial that public opinion should be enlightened."

Our duty then must be to endeavor to make that public opinion an enlightened one; to do all in our power to encourage the young people of our land to make the best of their opportunities in reaching the highest standard of educated citizenship; to give in word and deed our strongest support to the educational influences and institutions of this country; and may we soon see the dawning of that day when the intellectual and moral standards shall rise to a higher plane, and when the evil of ignorance, superstitions and illiteracy shall be swept from our midst.

Mr. Skinner's paper was as follows:

One of the greatest questions that has been holding the attention of the citizens and statesmen of this and other countries for the last two or three decades is one of the current topics upon which we may well spend some thought. A few facts will suffice to recall the important points of its history to our minds.

In the fifteenth century Spain wanted a canal cut through the Isthmus of Panama for the purpose of conquering Peru and Chili. She thought if there would be a canal there that she could drain these countries of all their gold and enrich herself immensely. Without this canal her ships would have to go around the continent of South America, a trip of many thousand miles, or to go over land, and both were very dangerous; but nothing was done by Spain except to explore for a strait.

Later, several other nations became interested among which was the United States. At this time Henry Clay was secretary of state, and, although he ordered an examination, nothing of consequence came of it

In 1849, however, the first company was organized by Cornelius Vanderbilt for the purpose of digging the Panama Canal. He saw necessity for this canal because of the fact that gold had been discovered in California, and, there being no transcontinental railroad, and hence many dangers in crossing the continent way of reaching the goldfields. There would be but few dangers to go by ship around by Florida, through a canal in the Isthmus of Panama and up the coast to California. Mr. Vanderbilt thought that this would be a good investment; so he went to work. After the company had spent about two million dollars, it asked aid from the government but, being refused, work was stopped.

Nothing more of any importance was done until 1879, when a Panama Congress was held in Paris. This congress was attended by engineers from all the civilized world. A company was organized and it decided to build a sea level canal. They estimated the cost at between sixty and one hundred and fifty million dollars. De Lesseps was to build the canal and they gave him one hundred sixty million dollars with which to do it. This sum, however, was reduced to one hundred and twenty million. He was to build the canal twenty-nine and one half feet deep, seventy-two to seventy-eight feet wide at the bottom and ninety-two to one hundred and sixty-four feet wide at the top. He employed the use of all the latest machinery and expected to finish the ditch in a very short time. After working for about seven years, the company found that after spending nearly two hundred million dollars the work was but one third done. They therefore needed money badly so they tried to bribe for it and the result was the development of one of the worst scanda's in the history of France besides the bankruptcy of the company. A new company was organized in 1894 but it was unable to continne the work long.

In 1895 the United States government authorized what it know as the Ludnow Commission to look into the Panama Canal progress put nothing much was accomplished.

Then, in 1899 the Walker Commission was sent to Panama to thoroughly examine prospects for a canal. It reported that the work that had been done on the Canal was worth forty million dollars and the tools that were left were useless.

France wanted one hundred and two million four hundred thousand dollars for the work that De Lesseps had done and the United States of Columbia wanted ten million dollars in gold and two hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually for nine years.

The government was undecided whether to cut the canal through Lake Nicaragua or the way that De Lesseps had started. The House of Representatives passed a bill to the effect of having it go the Nicaraguan route but it was rejected in the Senate. Then a law was passed having it go the original way.

France agreed to take forty million dollars. While all these investigations and discussions were going on Panama had declared herself independent of United States of Columbia. Then she let us have the privilege on the same terms to which Columbia had agreed.

By this time a lock canal was decided on that would be about forty nine and two thirds miles long, extending from where the water is six fathoms deep in Lemon Bay to where it is the same depth in the Bay of Panama.

In March 1904 a company was organized with Walker at the head of it. In one month they were beginning the work which is still in progress.

At the present time the work that is carried on is immense: there being twenty-seven hundred men at work using steam shovels that take twenty tons of dirt at a dip. Up to February, 1909, sixty-two million cubic yards of earth had been removed leaving about one hundred eleven million cubic yards yet to be taken out. The most of the excavating has been done in Culebra Cut.

This Cut is about nine miles long and goes right through a part of the Andes Mountains. The amount of work that is going on in that Cut is wonderful. They drilled twenty miles in one month for blasting. They use nine miles of fuse and thousands of exploders with about three and one half million pounds of dynamite every month. In this way, with the aid of steam shovels they have excavated 1,868,729 cubic yards of dirt per month; reducing this it gives us 166 cubic yards per minute. To carry away this dirt it takes sixty-two locomotives eight hours a day. These figures show the immensity of the work undertaken.

The cost of digging a cubic yard of dirt was eighty cents; but it has been reduced to forty cents by improved methods of work. In the same way the cost of removing rock has been reduced from two and one half dollars to fifty cents a cubic yard.

Another difficult part of this great work is the building of the Gatum Dam. This dam is to be eight thousand feet long, eighteen hundred feet thick and one hundred thirty five feet high. Imagine that if you can. This is to dam up the River Charges and it will flood an area of one hundred ten square miles which is almost one sixth the area of Garrett county.

Lately there was a discussion about this great dam. It was thought by some that there was a subterranean lake under the site of the dam and that it would sink. To confirm their opinions the rock that was put in did sink, but it proved to be nothing but the heavy rock displacing the lighter mud and earth

This was one reason for President Taft's trip to the canal this year. He took with him several expert engineers to examine the canal and the dam especially; also, to determine whether it would be a sea level or a lock canal. They decided on a lock canal as it would be less costly. The engineers and Mr. Taft seemed pleased in every way with the progress of the work. They say that by January first, 1915, the canal would be finished. Mr. Taft recommended that they put in electric lights and work night and day in order to shorten the time.

We have been considering the cost and work of this great enterprise so now we shall consider the benefit to be derived.

When this canal is finished it will be a great advantage to the United States in both commerce and war. This will cause many of the unsettled though fertile portions to be developed to a better advantage. For example in Texas there is a valley from Galveston to Houston, that is about fifty miles long, which is said to be the most fertile valley in the world. This valley will be cultivated and the crops sent to the Pacific coast where good prices can be had for them; furthermore, this valley is the outlet to very rich timber lands extending into Western Texas for seven hundred miles and the development of it will mean incalculable wealth to the nation. This is only one of many examples, however.

But our commerce may be greatly quickened in other ways by bringing the ships into competition with one another and with the railroads. For this reason some railroads have fought the canal.

On the other hand if we were to be involved in a war with any nation after the ditch is completed it would be of great value to us, for the fleets could be transferred from the Atlantic to the Pacific in a time far shorter than is required at present. In the Spanish American war, when the battle ship Oregon was in the Pacific Ocean she was ordered to report in the Atlantic Ocean as soon as possible. If the canal had been there then she could have reached the scene of action in a very few days; but, as it was the battles might have been fought or the war closed before her arrival.

Hence, when we think of the vast benefits to be derived from this great project, when we consider the thousands of acres of undeveloped territory that are to be brought into a state of cultivation, when we think of the millions of dollars worth of property that will be practically useless for decades without this improvement, when we view the spread of our civilization that will be carried to the remotest corners of our continent partly through this instrumentality, and when finally, we realize the unbounded influence that will have on the affairs in general of Uncle Sam in both peace and war, although we may stop to count the cost, we can not help believing that this is a vastly paying investment and that it is one of the worthiest of modern times. Our great United States Government is at the head of it and it must go through, and may the time speedily come when our brightest dreams of increased prosperity to many parts of our land in particular, and to America in general, may be fully realized.

BITTINGER.

A terrific wind storm swept over this section of the county on Wednesday of last week. The wind blew steadily all day and at times with such force as to amount almost to a hurricane. Trees were uprooted, fences blown down and in some instances buildings unroofed, the greatest reported damage being done to the large barn on Daniel Brenneman's farm, located on Manideer's Ridge. The roof was lifted from the building and turned completely over and the barn was considerably damaged otherwise.

Jacob Stark returned to his home near this place last week, after having been released from the Maryland House of Correction, where he had served a term of eighteen months.

Masters Rex and Rush Boucher, of near Rockwood, Pa., are visiting at C. E. Ellithorn's this week.

Messrs. Charles Buckle, Cleaver Brenneman, Asa Bittinger and Clark Brenneman were visiting in Meyersdale, Pa., last Friday and Satnrday.

Mrs. Thomas Swan, who spent the past two weeks with her sister at this place, returned to her home at Bloomington Monday.

Mr. and Mrs. Duckworth, of Keyser Ridge, were guests at Joel Orendorf's last Sunday.

C. E. Elithorp disposed of a car load of fertilizer to his farmer friends in this neighborhood last week.

Thomas B. Wiley and Albert Brenneman were delivering maple sugar and syrup to their customers in Oakland last week.

Miss Missouri Bowman, of Accident, was a caller in this village last Monday morning.

Miss Lizzie Orendorf, of this place, is attending the normal school at Grantsville.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Natural gas is occupying the attention of the citizens of this community to the exclusion of almost everything else. Most of the property owners in Mountain Lake Park and Loch Lynn have signed contracts obligating themselves to take the gas, which the gas company expects to be able to supply by midsummer.

Mr. James H. Jarboe, of Loch Lynn, aged eighty-two years, was stricken with paralysis last Friday and has been lying unconscious at the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. C. J. Rathbun. Mr. Jarboe is the oldest man in this section and until about two years ago was remarkably vigorous for a man of his age. His death is likely to occur at any hour.

Mr. C. W. Hopkins, real estate agent, has leased Briar-Bend boarding house to Miss Lucille Sawhill, of Pittsburg, Pa., who will conduct a first class boarding house during the season.

Rev. J. O. and Mrs. Bolton went to Wheeling Tuesday where Mrs. Bolton will remain some time with friends, Mr. Bolton returning to his work here in a few days.

Mr. Upton Cuppett is in receipt of a car load of high grade fertilizers which he will distribute among our enterprising farmers.

A car load of granulated lime was distributed among our farmers this week.

Mr. Lee N. Hayden will occupy a cottage on E street this summer.

SWANTON.

Harry Ashenfelter, aged sixteen years, son of Mr. J. D. Ashenfelter, is lying dangerously ill at his home with an attack of pneumonia. The youth is quite a favorite with all and his illness is regretted by his friends and acquaintances.

Mr. Charles M. Miller was in the county seat Monday on business.

Merchant and Postmaster William W. Sweet, who has been suffering for many months with a complaint quite serious, was somewhat improved last week and was able to walk about his room.

Operator and Mrs. Beightol were at Rawlings, Allegany county, last Saturday and Sunday, being called there by the death of Mrs. Beightol's father, Mr. Lynn Hutson, whose funeral occurred Sunday. The deceased was a prominent resident of Rawlings and was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

Rev. Brumbaugh is in the midst of a revival being held in the M. E. church here. Mr. Brumbaugh's ability as a minister is recognized by all who have heard him preach and success should attend his efforts.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. William Moody was a business visitor to Cumberland Monday.

Mr. Gillead Miller, of Schell, spent Easter Sunday with his son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Miller.

Mr. Fred. B. Hartman, of Barnum, accompanied by his mother, arrived home Monday morning, after spending the Easter holidays at Bethlehem, Pa. Mr. Hartman and his mother belong to the Moravian church and participated in the beautiful sunrise services of that denomination at Bethlehem on Easter morning. He reported the music as exceptionally fine this year, the choir being larger than usual and comprised among its new members some of the finest musical talent in the state. The procession from the church to the cemetery where the interesting services were conducted at sunrise, was lead by a band of eighteen trombone players.

Mr. I. H. Offner, of Keyser, was in Barnum and Cross on business Monday.

Mrs. G. C. MacFarlane, of Barnum, is the guest of relatives and friends in Baltimore this week.

Mrs. William Tibbetts, of this place, accompanied by her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Elrose Tibbetts, spent Monday in Cumberland.

Mrs. Minnie Colbert died of pneumonia at the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. James Breathwaite at Hampshire, on Saturday morning at ten o'clock. She was a widow and since the death of her husband made her home with her parents. On Sunday evening her remains were taken to Westernport over the W. M. R. R., to the home of her brother, Mr. Z. Breathwait, and on Tuesday morning were shipped over the B. & O. to Winchester, Va., to be buried beside the body of her little daughter, who died about three years ago.

One hundred Italians commenced raising track on the B. & O., at this place on last Tuesday morning.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Mullen were called to Gettysburg, Pa., on last Monday to attend the funeral of a cousin of Mr. Mullen.

Mr. Joseph Tibbetts, of Beryl, who underwent an operation for appendicitis at St. Joseph's Hospital, Baltimore about one week ago, is getting along nicely and expects to be home shortly.

The stork is getting busy about Barnum. He left a ten-pound boy at the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Mackenzie last week.

Mr. John Kemp, the well known restauranter of Frostburg, was in town on business the latter part of last week.

Owing to the illness of Miss Lula Coffman, organist at the M. E. church, Easter services have been postponed until next Sunday evening. Mr. Robt. Heatly, of Beryl, will supply the vacancy in case Miss Coffman's indisposition continues.

During the summer weather of the first few days of last week an unusual number of snakes were encountered in town and along roads in this neighborhood. Postmaster Stump caught two blowing vipers crawling into an empty mail pouch when he went to get the bag to put up the mail for 55 on last Tuesday. Just imagine if you can, the feelings of the postal clerk when he opened this pouch if these two ugly and venomous reptiles had gotten in the bag, been locked up with the mail and delivered to the train.

Mr. Ross Raley of Blaine, was in town on business, on Tuesday. Ross has signed a contract to play ball with the Charleroi team of the O. & P. League.

Mr George Mcfarlan, superintendent of the Monroe Mining Co., Barnum, got a nice Easter egg on last Sunday afternoon. Just as he was about to sit down to dinner a telegram was delivered announcing that an oil well has been struck on a lease in which he was interested producing about fifteen barrels daily. This is the third producing well on this lease. Not a single duster has been struck.

Mr. Edward Warnick, has purchased a new driving horse. He is speedy and shows up well in harness.

Sun Life Assurance Co., of Canada, Head Office Montreal.

Two Letters Proving Conclusively the Benefits of the Non-Forfeiture Clause of the Sun Life Policies.

No. 1.

Cumberland, Md., Nov. 11, 1908.

Mr. F. W. Claybrook, Jr., District Manager, Sun Life Assurance Co., of Canada, Cumberland, Md.

Dear Sir:—Allow me to thank your Company through you for their kindness in automatically advancing the third year's premium on my son's policy No. 120813, now due.

Owing to illness he has been unable to engage in his usual vocation and it is indeed gratifying to know that his policy contains the AUTOMATIC NON-FORFEITURE CLAUSE, which guarantees to continue the policy in force so long as the reserve on same lasts. This provision allows me sufficient time to secure the premium and the policy will not lapse on account of the non-payment of the premium.

Wishing for your Company much continued prosperity, etc., I am,

Very truly yours,

MRS. MARY A. DOERNER.

Mr. F. W. Claybrook, Jr., District Manager, Sun Life Assurance Co., of Canada, Cumberland, Md.

Dear Sir:—I desire to thank your Company through you for their promptness in settling the Death Claim under policy No. 120813 on the life of my late son Weyland Joseph Doerner. The check in full settlement of this claim was received by me within ten days after the completion of the papers. I also wish to express my appreciation for the courtesy of your office, which relieved me of all worry and expense at the time of my bereavement by the individual attention you gave to adjusting all matters conductive to the very prompt settlement made.

Wishing for the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada much continued success and prosperity, I am

Very truly yours,

FRANCHISES FOR NATURAL GAS TO BE PRESENTED

The Municipal Authorities of Oakland, Deer Park and Loch Lynn.

Natural gas will be introduced into Oakland, Deer Park and Loch Lynn Heights by the time the leaves fall if—

Franchises are granted the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Company by the municipal authorities of the several towns above named. The matter has now narrowed down to this point, and franchises will be asked of these municipalities by representatives of the gas company within the next few days.

Tomorrow morning the matter will be laid before the Deer Park Mayor and Council and in the afternoon a like petition will be presented to the Mayor and Council of Loch Lynn Heights. On Monday night at a special meeting of the Oakland Council the franchise, which is in course of preparation, will be presented to that body and there is very little doubt in the minds of the residents and property owners but that it will pass, as all the citizens are enthusiastically in favor of having the gas company lay the mains to Oakland, which will in all probability mean new life to the town in bringing industries here and adding to the comfort of our present residents.

CONFERENCE OF GARRETT COUNTY FOREST WARDENS

Was Held In the Court House In Oakland Tuesday of This Week.

The Forest Wardens of the southwest section of Garrett county met the State Forester in the County Commissioners' room at the court house on Tuesday for a conference on the forest fire question.

There were two sessions held—morning and afternoon—and the forest work was thoroughly gone over by the local and State Foresters. Those present at the conference were State Forester Besley and local Wardens W. T. Steyer, D. W. Wilson, Lincoln Sines, J. M. Falkenstine, J. F. Kimmell, L. L. Kimmell. During the day several land owners who are interested in forest fire protection came into the meeting. This conference is one or many that are being held in different parts of the state to formulate practical methods of suppressing forest fires and to secure a closer cooperation between the land owners and state forest service.

Following the Oakland meeting conferences were held at Frostburg Wednesday morning for the wardens of southeastern Garrett county and southwestern Allegany. Today a meeting will be held in Cumberland.

The forest fires last year were unusually severe and the people generally are aroused on the subject. The opinion was freely expressed at the Oakland meeting that the time is opportune for united action and that when the fire laws are generally understood there is a disposition to enter damage suits against railroad companies and individuals who set out fires in the woods. The law is so framed as to fully protect the land owner and where the evidence is at all conclusive little difficulty has been experienced in securing damages—at least that is the experience in other section of the State. The forest wardens were instructed, at the time of fires, to obtain as much evidence as to the origin as can be ascertained and this becomes available in the prosecution of damage suits.

A Sunday Afternoon Fire.

Last Sunday afternoon sparks from a kitchen flue set fire to the roof of the Felty house on Water street, tenanted by Uncle Harvey Turner and was blazing pretty briskly when discovered. A large crowd collected in a remarkably short time and while some climbed to the roof others formed a bucket line from the Little Youghiogheny and in a few minutes the blaze was extinguished. A portion of the roof of the main building was consumed, the loss being slight. Most of "Uncle Harvey's" household goods were carried to the street, his family being fearful that the building would be entirely consumed.

WHEELING BUSINESS MEN WILL VISIT US TODAY

Will Be Welcomed By Acting Mayor, Board of Trade and the Oakland Band.

Today at noon the annual excursion of the business men of Wheeling, West Va., will reach Oakland on a special train from the west and will be welcomed to our little city by Acting Mayor Stanton, a committee of the local Board of Trade and the Oakland Band.

As outlined in these columns last Thursday the object of the visitors is to get into closer relation with their customers and prospective customers in the territory adjacent to Wheeling and inspect the stores and other places of business.

The Wheeling party is composed of about sixty people, representing all lines of trade, and will remain here about half an hour. From Oakland the train will double back and make Grafton this afternoon. The party came here from Terra Alta after having visited Kingwood this morning.

THE DEATH RECORD.

LEE MCBRIDE.

News reached Oakland Tuesday morning of the death of Mr. Lee McBride, proprietor of the Brookside Inn and Cottages, located a few miles south of Oakland. Mr. McBride's health has been poor for a year or more, resulting from an operation performed about two years ago. His death occurred at his home in Cleveland, Ohio. He was aged sixty years.

MRS. ELIZA GNAGEY.

Mrs. Eliza Gnagey, widow of the late Emanuel Gnagey, of Grantsville, Garrett county, died at her home in Pasadena, Cal., Sunday, April 18, at 2.15 o'clock p. m. Her funeral took place on Tuesday last at Pasadena. Mrs. Gnagey's age was 80 years, 2 months and 26 days. For a number of years she resided in Pasadena and recently visited her kinsfolk in Garrett county. She leaves a number of children, among them being Mr. John E. Gnagey, recently of Accident, but now a resident of West Milton, Ohio. The deceased lady was a Christian of the highest type and was highly esteemed by all who knew her.

HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT TO BEGIN AT OAKLAND

This Is the Report Brought to Oakland This Morning By Mr. G. S. Hamill.

Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill, of Oakland, who has enviced great interest in the proposed highways to be built in this county by the State, has returned from a meeting of the Highways Commission held in Baltimore yesterday at which time Mr. Hamill laid before the Commission the great importance of beginning the work of improving the highways at Oakland, working toward the National Road on the North and the Northwestern Pike on the South and at the same time having work begin on the National Road at Frostburg and improve that highway as far west as Grantsville, thus giving all sections of the county advantage of the State aid.

Mr. Hamill is very much gratified with the encouragement given him by Governor Crothers who stated that work on the roads would begin at Oakland and that the interests of all sections would be kept in mind by the Commission.

Normal School Lectures.

At half past three o'clock every Friday afternoon at the Oakland Normal School a thirty-minute address on some educational or current topic is made by a prominent speaker. Last Friday Mr. Joseph E. Harned delighted the school with one of his characteristic and interesting addresses. These half hour talks are not only open to the general public but every resident of Oakland and friend of education in the county is cordially invited and urged to attend any or all of them.

Wednesday afternoon the students were favored with an hour's address by Dr. W. W. Davis, of Mountain Lake Park, on his trip to Europe. Dr. Davis is not only a fluent and interesting speaker, but proved himself a delightful entertainer as he described in detail the scenes and incidents of his trip from New York, via Gioraltar, to Naples, Rome, Florence, Milan, Switzerland, the Rhine country, Paris, London and home again. At the close of Dr. Davis' address the students unanimously invited Dr. Davis to give his illustrated lecture on Rome, which he has consented to do at some date to be announced later.

The new stereopticon lantern for the use of the school has arrived and on Tuesday evening was tested by Mr. Harned and Prof. Palmer. The machine is one of the latest models and adds very materially to the equipment of the school and will become a source of pleasure and profit to the students when it is put to use regularly.

CRAZED LUMBERMAN IS FOUND STARVING IN CAVE

Wandered for Weeks in Woods of Preston County. W. Va.

Richard Goff, aged 52 years, an employe of the Kingwood Lumber Company, was found starving in a cleft of rocks on the east side of Cheat river, in Preston county, near Trowbridge Ferry. He left Caddell, W. Va., in March. It is supposed that he was rendered unconscious by companions and robbed. His head and body are badly scarred. He had been in this condition for a month and ate bark of elm and birch trees and got water from sugar trees, which he tapped.

When Frank Menefee and Frank Stewart, who were walking through the woods, came upon him, Goff seemed afraid of them and tried to escape. He had been sleeping in the ledges of the rocks for a month. He weighed 195 pounds in normal condition, but is now only a shadow, as the result of weeks of exposure and starvation. Fortunately he was clothed in the heavy apparel of a woodsman and this doubtless saved him.

Goff says he has a sister in Kansas. He had been working in Pennsylvania previous to coming to West Virginia. He is now gaining physically and mentally. Goff can tell little about the two companions who were with him when he left Caddell, where he worked for the Kingwood Lumber Company, other than that they were from Pennsylvania. He cannot tell either, just how he got to the secluded spot where he was found.

Funeral of the late James H. Jarboe.

The funeral of the late James H. Jarboe, who died at Loch Lynn Heights on last Thursday morning, took place on Saturday morning last instead of Friday afternoon as first arranged, the change in the funeral being made so that his son John, of Illinois, could be present, who arrived at Loch Lynn Friday night. The funeral of Mr. Jarboe was under the auspices of the Grand Army of the Republic and his body was interred in the Oakland cemetery.

Land Slide on The Grade.

Last Monday afternoon a land slide occurred on the Seventeen Mile Grade west of Bloomington, which covered both tracks completely. One track however, was open in a few hours after the slide occurred, causing a delay to traffic of more than an hour. The South track was covered to a depth of some ten or twelve feet and it was not until Tuesday morning that is was cleared.

A DECREASED RATE OF COUNTY TAXATION

Commissioners Make Good Showing By Lowering Rate to $1.02.

The annual levy for county purposes was closed on last Friday by the Board of County Commissioners, who announced the rate at $1.02 on the $100 for county purposes and 16 cents on the $100 for state purposes, making the total rate of taxation $1.18. The rate last year for county purposes was $1.06, showing a decrease of 4 cents on the $100, and this in the face of an additional appropriation of $4,000 for the public schools and appropriating funds for other purposes not taken into consideration in prior years. The sum of $7,800 has been set aside for the payment of court house bonds and accrued interest.

A fight was made by the School Board to have the appropriation raised to $30,000 for support of the schools, the claim being advanced that it would be impossible to operate the schools for seven and a half months with a less amount. Investigation by the County Commissioners, however, showed very plainly that the sum set aside for this purpose—$24,000—would answer every necessity and the appropriation was accordingly made.

The Board of Commissioners is to be congratulated on the excellent record made in lowering the rate, the Board appreciating the fact that the present is not the time to lay any extra burdens upon the shoulders of the tax payers.

NORTH GLADE.

Spring is here and the farmers are busy sowing oats and planting potatoes.

Miss Gussie Rhodes is on the sick list at this writing.

Mrs. Lizzie O'Brien, who has been sick for some time, we are glad to say is getting better.

Mrs. Jacob Pence and family, of Bond, is visiting at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Beckman.

Mrs. Albert Baker, of Accident, spent Easter Sunday with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Buckner Mason.

Mr. Charlie Heck, of Cumberland, was the pleasant guest of Miss Maude Pritts Saturday evening.

With success to THE REPUBLICAN.

Miss Mary Farr, of West Union, W. Va., en route home from Washington, D. C., stopped off in Oakland Monday where she was the guest of Dr. and Mrs. R. B. Ward.

THE ROONEY WILL

BY

FRANK H. SWEET

Copyright, 1909, by American Press Association.

THE lawyer—a dry little man—said it was the strangest will he had ever helped to draw up. He felt he owed an apology to the relatives of the deceased for its peculiar phraseology. But they must please understand that he was not to blame. He had begged the testator to allow the terms to appear in the ordinary legal forms. He had argued, got angry even, but in vain. The stubborn old gentleman insisted on wording the will in his own way.

The deceased man's nearest relative was old Tom Gaynor, who, it was said, fully expected to come in for the bulk of the hoard. A proud, hard man was Tom, wealthy as wealth goes in rural Ireland, but as grasping of the penny as if he had nothing. The pride born of his wealth was shown in the way he treated suitors for the hand of his pretty daughter, Kitty. Decent, well to do farmers came seeking her, but old Tom would have none of them. It was said he was waiting till the possession of Rooney's money brought some of the big graziers of the neighborhood to his door, hat in hand, looking for Kitty.

Pretty Kitty, however, had already made her own choice, which by a certain lovable perversity was none other than Frank Murtagh, the very poorest of her suitors, himself also a relative of John Rooney. When his parents died John had taken him in and reared him as his own son. It was said that the two men had failed to hit it off together in later years. Frank was a merry, light hearted blade, and it was a matter of popular conjecture that his easy going ways had alienated whatever affection old Rooney may have entertained for him originally, and in the scale of expectations he was put down at a very low altitude.

But all suspense on this important matter would soon be at an end, for the lawyer, having cleared his throat, now commenced to read the will:

"I, John Rooney, sound of mind, do herewith make this my last will and testament. To that sorra-may-care rascal, Frank Murtagh, I bequeath the house and land about it on condition that he does not sell it for less than £200 for the far field and £500 for the house and near field, and, as this is about six times its value, he is not likely to get anybody fool enough to buy it of him. And I give my old clothes—not a thing more—to that niggard, Tom Gaynor"—

All eyes were turned on Tom, who, strange to say, took his treatment with perfect composure, except for a slight flush at the testator's personal reference. The lawyer gave a discreet cough and went on:

"He treated me like a dog when I was poor and fawned on me when he thought I had grown rich. And there's my old bamboo stick, that I used for many years, I leave to Frank Murtagh to belt ("my apologies, but belt is the—er—extraordinary word the testator insisted on using," mournfully protested the lawyer)—belt Tom Gaynor off these premises and lands if he dares to show his face on them. This duty I enjoin solemnly on Frank Murtagh, and if he fails to perform it everything I have left him goes to Cooldara chapel. And now I've bequeathed every penny I was possessed of, and much good may it do those that have got it."

HE DRAGGED THE VESSEL OUT OF THE HOLE.

And so the peculiar will came to an end. Astonishment gripped the room. Not a small amount of their wonder was expended on the calm way old Tom Gaynor had met the shattering of his expectations he was known to have entertained for Rooney's hoard.

But they would have ceased to wonder had they been privileged to know what was passing in Tom Gaynor's mind at that moment. On his way home he had paused at the road gate of one of Frank's fields and stood looking toward a hillock on the top whereof flourished a small tree.

"I'm too knowing for ye, John Rooney," said he. "I can see ye now—God be good to ye—as I saw ye that night six months ago dhragging the big iron pot and burying it close to that tree there, and there it is now, with the American money in it safe and sound for me when I like to go for it." and he gave a chuckle. "I'll go take a look to see the exact spot where the ould lad buried it."

Forgetting the terms of the will that warned him under penalties off the land, he crossed the gate. Frank, however, had perceived the movement from the kitchen window and, mindful of his testamentary obligations, snatched up the bamboo stick and charged down upon Tom, who thereupon regained the right side of the gate with alacrity. Frank was full of apologies for the harsh duty that had been imposed on him, but Tom made light of the matter, merely turning it to account to say a few indulgently sarcastic remarks about the queer, eccentric nature of old John Rooney. All the time his eye glittered on the hillock.

Now, though the hiding place of the treasure was known to Tom, there was one great difficulty still in the way of its acquisition. To enter a man's field and take something out of it was nothing short of theft. Therefore while the field belonged to another Tom was debarred by the most elementary principles of honesty from attaching the treasure. The only resource left, then, was to wheedle Frank into selling the valuable piece of land.

The realization of this project was made easy by the appearance that evening of Frank Murtagh, bent on asking Tom to give him Kitty. When they were wrapped in the secrecy of the parlor Tom craftily introduced his scheme. He was aware of Frank's circumstances, he went on to say, and how small was the amount of ready money old John Rooney had left him to carry on the work of the farm. Knowing this, he felt certain he would not be able to sleep o' nights if Frank's position was not made easier. He had thought the matter over and evolved a very good idea. It was to buy the far field of Frank—yes, even at the prohibitive price old Rooney had put upon it.

When the matter was arranged Frank took occasion to venture his proposal for Kitty. Tom's good humor at once evaporated. He shook his head severely.

"Don't let that idea into your head, my boy," said he. "Ye're no match for her. 'Tis one of them big graziers Kitty will be getting. No, no; thry somewhere else." Then, anxious to avoid offending Frank, he added in a softer tone: "Ye see, Kitty's only a young girl yet. She won't be on for marrying these years. An', sure, haven't you time enough yourself too? Musha, what hurry's on ye to get yerself spanchelled? Mebbe in a year or two ye'll be betther off than ye are now. Then come to me an' we'll talk about Kitty."

The day he entered into possession of the field was a great day for Tom. When all were abed that night he took a spade from the stable and cautiously made his way to the hillock where he had seen old John Rooney burying the iron pot. Feeling round the brow of the hill, he found the loose scraws of earth and knew that the treasure could not be more than two feet away from him. Seizing his spade, he commenced excavating with feverish eagerness. In a very short time—two minutes perhaps—the spade struck metal. Bending, he groped for the handle of the pot and, seizing it, dragged the vessel out of the hole. The mouth of the pot was merely covered with rough sacking, but with admirable self restraint Tom determined to refrain from making acquaintance with the contents till he had reached the friendly haven of his own kitchen.

With a cool deliberation, remarkable when the occasion is considered, Tom lit a lamp when he had placed the pot on the floor. Then he bent down and with just a slight trembling of the fingers proceeded to untie the rope that bound the sacking. The knot was presently loosened; it fell away, off came the sacking, and Tom's eyes glared vacantly at—stones.

"It must be underneath," he muttered hoarsely.

But when the contents were strewn on the floor nothing was shown but stones mingled with sand and ashes.

"The villain—the old schaming rogue! Full of tricks he always was!" muttered Tom, and that was all he said during the half hour he sat staring wildly at the heap, occasionally turning, with a start, to hear in the chirrup of a cricket the jeering cackle of old John Rooney.

Presently he rose, cleared the rubbish into the yard and went to bed.

Next morning the first poignancy of his disappointment was passed. Indeed, the matter that stood most prominently in his mind was the loss of the £200 he had paid for the field. But on further thought he was able to relieve his depression by the conclusion that he would have small difficulty in coaxing the amount from easy going Frank and so restore affairs to their original condition.

With this purpose in view he set out to call on Frank, quite forgetting the warning in the will and the bamboo stick.

Frank, too, appeared to have permitted his testamentary duties to slip his memory, for he bade the old man welcome and haled him to the parlor with every demonstration of respect. The object of Tom's visit filled him with delighted speculation. Was it something about Kitty? Had Tom repented of his harsh opposition?

His heart leaped wildly, but grew calm enough again when Tom referred with mournful air to the matter of the purchase of the field as the reason of his call.

The mention of Kitty was enough for Frank. Up he jumped and, going to the press in the corner, extracted from a little box the check just as Tom handed it to him.

Tom's eyes glittered as he crushed it into his pocket.

"You're a thoroughbred, Frank," said he, "and if I can do anything for ye, my boy, command me."

"Give me Kitty, then," said Frank, promptly seizing the opportunity.

Good humor instantly fled the old man's face. It became hard, flinty. But, conscious that he owed Frank something for the ready return of the check, he resorted to diplomatic evasion to smooth over the incident.

"Before I answer that let me ask you a question," he said.

"Well?"

"Have you ever made a search for Rooney's money that he got by the American uncle?"

"Indeed I did. I searched everywhere in the house, but not a thrace of it could I find."

"But it must be somewhere, Frank. Ould John couldn't have taken it away with him."

"That's thrue."

"Well, now, just listen to this. If you find that money I'll give you Kitty."

Frank's eyes rolled wildly in the excitement of the prospect this remark opened out to him. In one of these revolutions they encountered the bamboo stick. A chill struck him, for he was at once reminded of the duty imposed by the will, which left him no alternative but to "belt" out of the house the man whom it was his best interest to propitiate. But, though his soul girded at the task, the bamboo drew him as if the very spirit of old John Rooney possessed it.

"Sorry I am, Tom Gaynor, but ye must get out of this," he said, leaping to his feet and running to the corner. "Remember what the will said, man. You're to be belted out of this place every time ye come into it. Be off now, if you plaze. Quick, man! Sure it's not my fault, but it can't be helped anyway."

Frank purposely fumbled with the stick to allow Tom to collect faculties grievously scattered by the abrupt outburst.

"Are ye gone?" cried Frank, waving the bamboo menacingly as he swung around, just in time to see old Tom's coattails disappear through the door.

Down along the path sped Tom, with Frank not a yard behind, improving his position gradually by way of demonstrating that there was no deception in his effort. To give further evidence of his determination to carry out his testamentary obligations, he made a fierce blow at Tom just as he flew through the gate. The blow missed Tom, as indeed it was intended to do, but struck the gate with terrific force.

Now in safe territory, Tom drew up, gasping for breath, while Frank gazed ruefully at the bamboo broken across the middle.

"Begor, I've done for ould Rooney's bamboo," said he. "But what's this here?" gazing closely at the slit. "It's hollow within, and there's something in it. What can it be?" he added, pulling out a long tube of papers.

"There's more of them here up the hollow," he said, throwing the papers on the ground and proceeding to further investigation. "This is something ould Rooney hid here. I'll hould ye. What can it mane, I wondher?"

"Mane!" cried Tom, who had picked up the roll and opened it. "What can it mane!" with a hoarse shout. "It manes that these are bank notes for £50 apiece; aye, and here are more for £100."

The pair stood and gasped their astonishment.

"The American legacy," whispered Frank when he had caught his breath.

"That's just what it is," returned Tom, vaulting from trembling excitement to genial enthusiasm. "Frank, my boy, I congratulate ye. Ye're the richest man in the county this minyet."

"And—and"— murmured Frank.

Old Tom saw the question in the young man's eyes and cut his hesitation short with a laugh.

"Don't throuble to say another word," he said. "Kitty's yours, my boy, and my big blessing on ye both."

JOE MEETS STRANGER

Encounters Venerable Critter With Pack on His Back.

HAILS HIM WITH HEARTINESS

They Converse of Things That Make Even a Good Man Better—Struggle Over Game of Cards—Ends In Victory For Pilgrim.

[Copyright, 1908, by T. C. McClure.]

I WAS proceeding on my happy way between the enterprising town of Jump Off and Happy Day and I was a-saying to myself how much better it was to be innocent than to have a mother-in-law when I encountered a venerable critter with a pack on his back and a staff in his hand. He had chin whiskers that waved in the breeze, and on his face there rested a look of innocence and goodness. I knew him at once for a feller pilgrim, and I hailed him with heartiness. When he had hailed me in return he gave me his wrinkled hand and said:

"Stranger of the highway, I recognize in thee a kindred speerit, and I am rejoiced to meet thee. Thou art one who loves his feller man."

"Yes, most of the time," I answered.

"Thou hast pity for the sorrering and downtrodden."

"Heaps of it."

"Thou hast sympathy for an erring brother."

"His case always brings tears to my eyes."

"Thou wouldst that all men were honest and upright and that the sins of the world were cast far, far away."

"That's me to a checker. If I had my way about it there would be no guile in the hearts of men and no spavins on the legs of horses. The days should be forty-eight hours long and every day full of glad sunshine and those good deeds that make a man's conscience swell like dried apples in the stewing."

"'Tis well," said the stranger. "I knew that I could not be mistaken in that face of yours. Descend from the vehicle, feller pilgrim, and let us sit here on the grass and converse of the things that make even a good man better."

I complied with his request, and for a quarter of an hour we praised the goodness and lamented the badness of men and wondered if the day would ever come when Wall street would find its last sucker. By and by, after uttering a groan and wiping away the falling tears, the old man turned to me and asked:

"Pilgrim, dost it happen that thou hast a pack of what they call playing cards in thy pocket?"

"You mean those cards with pictures and spots on them?"

"Aye, truly."

A Pack of Cards.

"Then it happens that I have a pack. I found them beside a straw stack, where, I fear, a quartet of men without fear of the future in their hearts had been playing a game called poker."

"'Tis well. In a dim way I have heard of the game. I have sometimes thought I would like to learn it in order that I might show the unwary the guile there is in it. I wouldst hold up an object lesson to them."

"'Tis a thought worthy of a weary pilgrim traveling from afar. No man of innocent heart and pure motives can hope to rake in a pot with three jacks in his hand when the bad man opposite has a full house. Shall we spread a blanket between us and teach each other the game that we may be the better prepared to warn others of the danger of raising the pot on a four flush?"

"Yea; it might be well," he replied in a humble way and with a faraway look in his eyes.

For ten minutes we taught each other the value of the cards, and it was surprising how fast we both picked up information. Then it was the venerable and guileless stranger who looked off over the rolling prairies of Oklahoma, rich with the memories of pipe lines and sich, and whisperingly suggested that a little stake would make the game more exciting. Without suspicion of him in my heart and solely with a desire to send a cash contribution to the heathens of Africa I consented, and we each deposited a dollar on the cloth. As we did so I thought I caught a gleam of avarice in the old man's eyes, while, as I had mine cast down, I am sure he saw nothing.

The heathens of Africa had lost $10 through me when there came a feeling to my breast that venerable was not altogether a pure and innocent hearted man, and I began to sit up and take notice. We had $30 on the blanket when I got a straight flush in my hand. I reasoned it out that if venerable was the man I now suspicioned him to be he would have a hand of fours. The way he began to raise me warmed the cockles of my heart and sent my sympathies pouring out for the unfortunate. We were very humble as we played. Outside of our raises we talked mostly of orphans and heathens and of the joy of presenting them the wherewithal to buy winter underclothing and to indulge in quail on toast. By and by, when the pot amounted to $100 or more, venerable got scared and called my hand. It was a proud moment for the heathen when I laid down that straight flush. It was a thing of beauty. It beat a red wagon just out of the paint shop. For a long minute the stranger gazed on it, and then he precipitated himself upon me and made use of words not known to the language of Greece in its foremost days. It was a struggle for the right—that is, for the privilege of forwarding that hundred bones to the spot where it would do the most good—and right conquered. It always does if it has got the most muscle behind it, though it may receive a black eye and a skinned nose in the conquering.

When I had hammered old venerable to my heart's content I rose from his recumbent carcass and gathered up the spoils of virtue and drove away. As I drove many sayings came into my mind and were uttered by my lips, such as:

"He who is armed with integrity can suffer no defeat."

And likewise:

"The guilty man overcometh himself."

And once more:

"He who buildeth on deception will come to be tangled up among the ruins of his own house."

Any one knowing the address of an African heathen who is hard up will do me a favor by forwarding it. Give postoffice box if possible. Meanwhile the hundred will remain in my hind pocket.

Enters Town of Jump Off.

I entered the town of Jump Off with a bird singing in my heart and the glad thought in my soul that the world had grown 50 per cent better since the elections. But, alas, I was to be made the victim of man's wiles again. The mayor of the town came forward and gave me the glad hand and extended the freedom of the city, which meant that I could drink in every saloon in the place if I had the cash to pay for it. I had pitched my tent and got ready to take tintypes at 10 cents a take when old venerable, who had revived and followed on, struck the burg. He did not seek me out, as one pilgrim should another, but went to the mayor and declared that I had assaulted and despoiled him on the highway. His honor called for my side of the story. Truth and integrity showed so plainly in my face that he could not doubt me. He offered to boot old venerable out of town if I would share my winnings with him.

I could not consent. I had played poker from one of the noblest sentiments that can actuate the human heart, and I did not wish to degenerate it into mere dross. I was given ten minutes in which to make up my mind, and as I remained steadfast to principle, which means never let go of anything you've got into your pocket, I was driven out of the town in ignominy and humiliation and made to pass the night on the prairie in a sobbing rainstorm. I hugged that wad of greenbacks to my damp heart, however, and felt that though man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn, as the family almanac has it, $50 in cash goes a long ways in setting up mint julips in hot weather.

WAS THE BISHOP RIGHT?

Evidence That Restrictive Legislation Is Not Enslavement.

Some years ago when there was strong movement in England in favor of a more strict regulation of the liquor traffic, some favoring out and out prohibition, one of the bishops declared himself opposed to the measures advocated because he would rather see England drunk and than enslaved. His view was that men should not be forced into sobriety and that any legislation that compelled men to give up drink would be oppressive. Men should be left free to use it or not as they pleased. If they were compelled to stop using it you made slaves of them. He would rather see a nation of drunkards than a nation of slaves.

This utterance has often been quoted, and by many people has been regarded as containing great wisdom. Is it presumptuous to declare now that it was a most unwise utterance, and that it will stand any careful consideration? asks Temperance. Let us look and see.

First of all there is a wide space between slavery and drunkenness. If the latter is put down it does not follow that the nation is to be enslaved, for there can be no restriction of the liquor traffic, severe or mild, without the consent of the people. The majority of the people have to approve or condemn such legislation before it can be made effective.

Then restrictive legislation is not something new, for the state urges the passage of very stringent laws whenever public health and public safety are put in peril.

If it can be shown that the liquor traffic has become a menace to the welfare of society, there can be no question as to the propriety of restrictive legislation.

If it can be shown to be so injurious as to imperil a large number in every community and to add to the expense of government, and if a majority of the people decide to put it down completely, who will question their right to do so?

Suppose that the most radical prohibitory measures prevail in any place, who are enslaved by such measures?

Certainly not the majority who favored the law, not the minors whom guardians are eager to keep from debasing influences, and not that large number who are indifferent one or the other.

Is it the habitual drunkard?

Under previously existing laws he can be shut up in jail now for intemperance and deprived of his liberty for weeks and months. It is no more like slavery to prevent his having the drink than to shut him up for making bad use of it later on.

The parties who are likely to cry out "slavery" are those who are in the liquor business, and also that portion of the community who claim the right to use intoxicants as they please, in large or in small quantities.

The former regard legislation generally as interfering with their business, and the latter think their personal liberty is abridged.

The whole matter comes back to the starting point that the majority must rule. If the majority believe it is for the best interests of the community to restrict or to abolish the liquor traffic, that then becomes the law and all must obey. There is no slavery in obeying law. If one does not like a law let him labor to have it repealed, but while it is the law he is expected to keep it. It is simply absurd to raise the cry of "slavery" just because laws may be enacted which some do not like.

Liquor Drinkers and Life Insurance.

Life insurance companies are adopting stronger measures for the examination of moderate drinkers. One of the largest companies now declares that no saloonkeeper or brewer is rich enough to get a policy with them, while even those who drink with moderation are considered poor risks. What is true of this company is considered true of all others. Some now require an agreement that if death results from drink their policy becomes void. In this connection it will be remembered that Sir Thomas Whittaker, who is a medical examiner for a life insurance company that has separate classes for abstainers and so-called moderate drinkers, says statistics compiled for many years past show that teetotalers live from 25 to 30 per cent. longer than drinkers.

Drink the Greatest National Menace.

"I have been made a teetotaler," said a United States senator not long ago, "by the sight of the hangers-on of the average saloon. Every avera class saloon has a clientele of po wretches whose appetite for drink has got the better of them. Many of these unfortunates have still more unfortunate families dependent upon them. The total aggregate of these human wrecks is much greater than the nation's standing army. This is too great a price to pay for the privilege of what is known as personal liberty. If I had my way, I would abolish the liquor traffic, root and branch. It is the nation's greatest curse, and no amount of specious reasoning can overturn the evidenced truth of such an assertion."

RYAN FOR SENATE IS PROGRAM AGAIN

Has Decided to Make Race in Nebraska, Definite Report Says.

WASHINGTON, April 19'—That William Jennings Bryan has about resolved that he will make the race for Senator in Nebraska next year is the latest information that comes from his State.

After the Presidential election last autumn it was commonly accepted that, his home State having gone Democratic, Mr. Bryan would become a candidate for the Senate. His party had complete control of the Legislature, and set about to put into the books various measures which Mr. Bryan had advocated, especially a bank guarantee law and the Oregon Senatorial primary and election law.

Later came the report that Mr. Bryan had about decided to change his plans and his closest friends were for a number of months of the opinion that he had given up the thought of running for the Senate. This impression was strengthened when it was announced that he had bought a farm in Texas.

But now comes from Nebraska the report, so definite as to amount almost to an announcement, that Mr. Bryan has decided to make the race. It is supposed that he believes he can win, and that coupled with this impression is the strong idea that he could maintain his hold on his party and make it more effective for the furtherance of his future plans by getting a place in the Senatorial forum.

Mr. Bryan would have to defeat Senator E. J. Burkett, who is serving his first term in the upper chamber, and is considered likely to have no serious opposition for the Republican nomination. Mr. Burkett is a politician of resource, energy and uniform success. He is a great organizer, which Mr. Bryan is not, and he has made some repute as a member of the more radical group of Western Senators.

The Democratic Legislature the other day unexpectedly passed a law requiring that all saloons in the State shall hereafter close at 8 p. m. While at first glance it was thought that the signing of the bill would greatly weaken Governor Shallenberger, that view is not now entertained by nearly all politicians. Mr. Bryan is known everywhere as a total abstainer, but he is one man who has never apparently been opposed by the saloon interest in his home State.

The Nebraska Republicans are more fearful of outside influence, sentimental rather than political, than they are of the real strength of Mr. Bryan at home. They realize that if a considerable volume of sentimental demand goes up from the country, rather non-partisan in character for "Bryan in the Senate," it will have some effect in the State. If they can only keep the sentimentalists away and have a political campaign on political issues, the Republicans think they will come through safely.

That careful inquiry is to be made by the Senate at no very distant date into the workings of the civil service system was indicated clearly in the course of the debate on the census bill. Great dissatisfaction was expressed by some Senators with the workings of the present civil service system, even by Senators who are not willing to go back to the old spoils system. But there was a great deal of sentiment to the effect that the system has many defects that need correction.

Senator Cummins is chairman of the Senate Committee on Civil Service, and is opposed to the plan of returning to the spoils system. But he is convinced that there is need for reform in the civil service. He said so in the course of the discussion in the Senate on the census bill, and made it clear that as chairman of the Committee in question he intended to try to bring about changes.

The abuses with respect to the civil service, as complained of, were brought out in a general way in the debate. They relate largely to promotions. It is charged that the division chief is made a petty boss by the present system, and that persons who do not kotow to the division chief are apt to "get the worst of it." Senator William Alden Smith intimated conditions in some of the divisions which he could not discuss publicly—conditions arising out of the determination of the division chief to dictate the conduct of female employees.

Moreover, there is much criticism that, while the civil service system is supposedly removed from the domain of politics, it is not so removed by any means, and "pull" and influence are still potent, especially as to promotions. The suspension of the civil service requirements in certain cases is a system Congress does not like, especially when the President does the suspending.

It will not be surprising if the Senate next winter concludes to go deeply into the abuses that are charged to the civil service system. Many members of the Senate and house dislike the civil service, but it is clear that it has come to stay. It is likely to be tightened up and to be improved, but it will not be abolished.

Senator Newlands of Nevada has directed the attention of the Senate to the fact that the spoils system ought to be abolished in respect to something else than appointments. He holds that the time has come to get rid of the "pork-barrel" system of appropriating for public works, especially river and harbor improvements.

These works, Senator Newlands holds, should be put under great engineers, constructors and architects, with large powers of iniative as to particular projects. Also he would organize a great bureau of architecture and arts, and in connection with such a bureau a commision of great artists, sculptors, constructors and builders and have them given large powers over public buildings.

In short, according to Senator Newlands, it is time to get rid of the spoils system in projects for improvement, as well as in patronage.

RICHARD CROKER'S LAMENT.

Richard Croker who ran the Tammany machine until folks began to ask impertinent questions and then ran away to Ireland, but who is now home temporarily, is quoted as uttering this pearl of wisdom:

Europe can give us points on personal liberty. Here we stopped horse racing, one of the grandest sports there is. We class it as a crime. We legislate as to what a man shall drink. The whole question will resolve itself to this: We'll make our money here but will go to Europe to enjoy it.

There are only a few misstatements in Mr. Croker's protest. Horse racing has not been stopped in this country, but some of the States forbid gambling and pool selling as an accompaniment to racing. Racing has not been classed as a crime in the United States. Neither do "we legislate as to what and when a man shall drink." Legislation prohibits no man from drinking, but it does specify where, when and under what circumstances intoxicating liquors may be sold. This is also done in Europe, though restrictions as to time and day are not as strict as in this country. "We'll make our money here," declares Mr. Croker "but will go to Europe to enjoy it." If it were desired to be personal, this might be amended in Mr. Croker's case to read "get" instead of "make." At any rate there is grave doubt whether Tammany's distinguished son is deriving real enjoyment from his expatriation. Be that as it may, there is slight danger that this country will languish, or suffer over-much deprivation, as a consequence of migration by our rich men to other shores to "enjoy" the money they make on this side. At most they will be few in number, and just in proportion that they cease to "make" money here once they have accumulated a sufficiency, there will be opportunity for others to foregather with a competency.—Pittsburg Gazette Times.

THE GOSPEL IN ANTIOCH

Sunday School Lesson for April 25, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 11:19-30; 12:25. Memory verses 22, 23.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch."—Acts 11:26.

TIME.—The Antioch church was formed soon after the martyrdom of Stephen, A. D. 36. Paul and Barnabas were at Antioch in some part of A. D. 43-46. The famines occurred during A. D. 43-48; that in Palestine (Ramsay) in A. D. 46. The visit of Paul and Barnabas (Ramsay) to Jerusalem was probably the same year, A. D. 46.

PLACE.—Antioch, the rich and important capital of Syria, 300 miles north of Jerusalem. St. Luke was a native of Antioch; so was Chrysostom.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

"Having proceeded to such a length, the rage of the people turned upon the whole Christian body."—Cambridge Bible. The disciples "were scattered abroad." The Greek verb is based upon the thought of seed-sowing, and indeed every disciple was a seed of truth. May all Christians be such when they go abroad, traveling either for business or pleasure. The Jews were like foolish children trying to stamp out a forest fire, and merely spreading more widely the sparks and blazing coals. The disciples were driven "as far as Phenice" (Phoenicia, the Mediterranean coast north of Galilee), "and Cyprus" (the large Mediterranean island northwest of Jerusalem, 60 miles from the Phoenician coast), "and Antioch" (the most northern city on the coast. Thus the fleeing Christians, "following the track of coasting vessels, went northward."—Rackham.

It is easy even for the modern church to conceive Jewish prejudices, and feel that there is no possibility of much good outside "our" denomination, or "our" country, or "our" race. True Christianity, however, makes its followers realize that all men are brothers for whom Christ died, and that the most degraded nations and races have in them the making of saints and apostles.

V. 21. "A great number believed, and turned unto the Lord." The reasons for this were many:

1. The Christians who established the Antioch church had been strengthened by persecutions, which they had met with unflinching bravery and fidelity.

2. The very vices of Antioch showed the need of a purifying gospel, and doubtless many were disgusted with them and eager to turn from them. The strongest Christians often grow up amid corruption.

3. The people of Antioch were energetic, vigorous, in the habit of doing things. The aggressive character of Christianity appealed to them, and when they accepted the new religion, they carried into it the same activity that had brought success in the worldly enterprises of Antioch.

4. But the chief reason for the growth of the Antioch church is given in the text. "The hand of the Lord was with them." "The hand" is the symbol of power and of work. Willing Christians are God's hands. Through them God can easily accomplish what would be impossible to their unaided efforts. Here were a little group of refugees, poor, despised, pursued. Here was one of the world's proudest, mightiest, richest, wickedest cities. And the handful of refugees so moved upon the city that three centuries later its greatest son, Chrysostom the golden-mouthed preacher, said that half its population were Christian.

V. 22. "They sent forth Barnabas," that he might (1) learn the exact state of affairs, since rumors, untrustworthy even in these days of the telegraph, were doubly doubtful then; (2) encourage the new disciples; (3) warn them against error, and (4) prevent discord between the Jewish and Gentile converts, of which the sequel showed the real danger (Acts 15:1-25). They might have sent a letter, but face-to-face methods are always best.

V. 28. "A great dearth throughout all the world . . . in the days of Claudius," the Roman emperor who reigned A. D. 41-54. This does not mean "all the world" in our enlarged sense, but all the civilized world, the Roman empire; nor does it mean that the famine fell upon all parts simultaneously. That widespread failure of harvests and scarcity of food did occur is "singularly well attested, considering the scantiness of evidence for this period. Suetonius alludes to assiduae sterilitates causing famine prices under Claudius, while Dion Cassius and Tacitus speak of two famines in Rome; and famine in Rome implied dearth in the great corn-growing countries of the Mediterranean; Eusebius mentions famine in Greece, and an inscription perhaps refers to famine in Asia Minor."—Ramsey. The famine probably occurred in Judea A. D. 44-46. Josephus tells us that the Syrian queen Helena of Adiabene, a Jewish proselyte who was then in Jerusalem, imported corn and figs from Egypt and Cyprus, which she distributed among the people to save them from starvation.

This account of the Antioch church is a mirror in which we may view ourselves. Are we true to Christ amid trials and temptations? Is our Christian fellowship broad? Are we practically helpful to others? Are we bold to confess Christ, and able, in the strength of the Holy Spirit, to bring men to Christ? All this is involved in the picture of the church whose members were the first to be called Christians.

USED BY REVOLUTIONISTS

War Department to Stop the Selling of Discarded Arms.

Cumulative evidence which has reached Washington convinces the officials that had he been permitted to remain in the vicinity of Venezuela, former President Castro would have made an effort to recoup his lost prestige in that country. The former president's utterances in Germany, indicating a sentiment in some sections of Venezuela favorable to him and to his ambitions, and other advices, strongly support the view that Castro felt hopeful of again restoring himself in public favor in Venezuela, if chance were given him.

No more cheap revolutions in neighboring countries will be encouraged in the easy manner in which it has been to purchase the old arms of the United States. Orders have been issued at the war department stopping the selling of discarded arms. It has been reported at various times that revolutionists in Central and South America obtained arms from the United States.

It remained, however, for the police of Chicago to complain that the sale of old Springfield rifles, recently discarded, was causing trouble for them. That complaint was followed by an order against the sale of the remaining 9,000 rifles by auction. These rifles may be sold to patriotic organizations only.

Western Athletes Will Race to the Top of a 6,000 Foot Mountain.

Crack athletes from all over the west are entered in a race to the top of Mt. Wilson, north of Pasadena, Cal. The unique character of the event and its great success last year have aroused much interest among the sports and others attracted by endurance contests and have drawn runners desirous of making the 6,000 foot ascent in quicker time than made by Joe King last year. There is little doubt that King's record, 1 hour 25 minutes 30 seconds will be broken.

Last year's race consisted of the ascent to the top of the mountain and the descent, but this year the ascent alone will count. The descent is considered too dangerous for men trying to make time. On the way up and down Mount Wilson the runners cross numerous streams and wind around canyons over 3,000 feet deep.

At least thirty men will face the starter and will be sent away at intervals of three minutes. Only amateur athletics are eligible to enter the race. The winners will receive medals.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, APRIL 22, 1909.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Candidates for nomination on the Republican ticket are invited to annonnce themselves through this medium. For this service a flat rate of $5 for each announcement, covering the publication in this column until the nominations are made, has been fixed. The cash should accompany the order.

FOR HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the nomination for member of the House of Delegates, subject to the decision of the Republican Convention, and earnestly solicit the support of my friends throughout the county. If nominated and elected I promise my best endeavors for the advancement of the interests of the people of Garrett county. W. W. SAVAGE.

Friendsville, March 30, 1909.

A LASTING EVIL.

The evil that men do when they manufacture an artificial scarcity of foodstuffs lives long. Corners may be successful or unsuccessful, and the daring gamblers who contrive to bring them about may gain fortunes or go to ruin, all within a few weeks or months, but if these operations chance to affect retail prices a lasting wrong has been accomplished. Those who look closely into the causes of the increased cost of living, especially in cities, find that there is always an excuse for higher prices and rarely a reason having sufficient force to carry prices down. A blighted crop, a strike, a corner, a temporary demand in excess of supply or a new fashion may explain exorbitant charges. These conditions speedily pass away, and yet it is not often that prices return to their former levels.

If the breadmakers shall be compelled by the present manipulation of wheat and flour to reduce the size of the loaf or to increase the price, it will be many a day before normal conditions can be restored, even with cheap wheat and flour in the market. The man who corners food not only robs millions, but he makes it possible for many others to do the same. The wrong which he perpetuates is continuing and cumulative. In many cases it has no end. Gambling in money and gambling in food can be stopped whenever the people reject the economic falsehood that betting on the markets is necessary to the proper regulation of prices, to the protection of capital and to the conservation of commodities.

UNION VETERANS AFTER CROTHERS

Cut Off Fund for Burial of Soldiers of North and South.

The annual state encampment of the Department of Maryland, Grand Army of the Republic, which opened at Wilson Post Hall, Gay and High streets, Baltimore, last Friday morning closed Saturday afternoon with the election and installation of officers for the ensuing year and the adoption of a resolution regretting the action of Governor Crothers in witholding his signature from the bill appropriating $1,500 for the burial of indigent soldiers of both Union and Confederate armies.

As originally introduced by Col. George W. F. Vernon and Col. James Campbell, past department commanders of the Grand Army in Maryland, the resolution severely criticized the Governor for his "vest pocket veto" of the appropriation after it had ,unanimously passed both houses of the General Assembly, and a warm debate took place.

The appropriation began with the administration of the late Governor Lowndes, and was continued through the administrations of Governor Smith and Governor Warfield. There was no excuse for the action of the present Governor, yet the more conservative veterans at the encampment felt that it would do no good to pass resolutions of censure. Gen. John R. King and Mr. C. A. E. Spamer had them tempered down to "a sincere regret that the Governor could not see his way clear to approve the appropriation." In this form the resolutions were finally passed. A copy of them will be sent to Governor Crothers. It was stated that during the past year eight old veterans died and that their burial expenses had to be paid by surviving comrades in the department.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Natural gas for this sectien is now assured and our people are much pleasad at the increased demand for property which they attribute largely to the coming of natural gas.

The problem of getting rid of the leaves is now on. Chautauqua Park has been cleaned and the Association grounds generally are in a better condition than usual at this time of the year, and many cottage owners have their premises cleaned up for the season.

Mr. U. A. Clayton, of Fairmont, was in the Park Monday and Tuesday for the purpose of having his cottage and grounds put in condition for summer occupancy.

Mr. Harrison Arnold, who spent the past winter in Morgantown, W. Va., is at home for the summer.

Messrs. John H. Jarboe, of Illinois, and Philip Jarboe, of Lonaconing, Md., attended their father's funeral here last week.

Messrs. Cuppett, Leighton & Co. distributed another car of lime in this neighborhood this week.

The Odd-Fellows of this neighborhood will attend divine service in the M. E. church next Sunday at 2.30 p. m. Rev. J. O. Bolton will deliver the sermon. A general invitation to be present is extended.

The Sunday School will meet next Sunday at 10.30 a. m., on account of the usual hour (2.30 p. m.) being given to the Odd-Fellows.

The large boarding house known as "The Queenwood," has been leased by B. F. Crane, Esq., of Loch Lynn, who will conduct a first-class boarding house.

The Alleghany House has been leased by Mrs. Jasper Guard. She will be assisted by two of her daughters who have had considerable experience at other boarding houses in the Park.

The Columbian Hotel will again be conducted by Mr. H. B. Lewis who will occupy the house with his family next week.

The Mountain Lake Pharmacy will be opened up for business about the first of June, with Mr. T. A. Gonder as manager.

Rev. L. A. Rudisill, our postmaster, will establish a branch office for the season at or near the Association office. This will be a great convenience to the Park patrons.

We will likely have three meat markets this season—at Cuppett, Leighton & Co.'s store, Felty's store and at the Hayden store building.

Mr. W. C. Dunnington, who will again conduct the Chautauqua Hotel, has leased the Hammond ice house and will fill it with artificial ice for his own use.

April 30 Arbor Day

Governor Crothers has announced that Friday, April 30, will be designated as Arbor Day. This is a school holiday rather than a State one, and the day is set aside to arouse the interest of children in trees and flowers.

Arbor day has become an institution in American life, and very few, if any, States fail to authorize its observance. More recently there has been organized a national association, with the view of promoting interest in country life. It has prepared booklets which will be distributed this year. The Governor said that he hoped these booklets will be generally used in the observance of the day.

BITTINGER.

On last Sunday morning at 10.30 o'clock, Rev. Alvin Yugel conducted a combined communion and confirmation service in the Lutheran church at this place, which meeting was largely attended and a large percentage of the congregation met at the sacred table and fiifteen young people were confirmed as members of the congregation.

W. A. Althers was in this settlement last week doing some painting for Peter G. Stark, and we understand that he has secured the contract to paint Jonas Bittinger's residence and the Lutheran parsonage.

Rev, J. B. Shoup, a former pastor of the Lutheran congregation at this place and one who is well known and held in in high esteem by many persons throughout the county, is arranging to revisit this place in May and expects to hold a regular G. A. R. memorial service at this place on May 30 and desires all his old comrades to keep the appointment in mind and prepare to meet him here in happy reunion.

The farmers are importing several cars of lime for use in the spring seeding and are busy preparing the soil for the reception of lime and seed.

Urner Beachy visited his brother, John L. Beachy, at Fort Hill, Pa., last week.

Mr. Claybrook, District agent for a Canadian Life Insurance Co., accompanied by his general agent, spent part of last week, in this section looking after business.

Leonard Shartzer, of Accident, was in this neighborhood last week, trying to purchase a work horse for farm use.

Dr. Briscoe, of Accident, was called to this village last week by the illness of Mrs. Adam Snyder.

Blowing Out Stumps.

About fifty people gathered to see the stump blasting demonstration given by the DuPont Powder Co. at Gortner on Saturday. The weather being so fine many were loth to leave their planting and lose the time but all of those present went away fully repaid for their time and trouble. It was plainly shown that removing stumps with dynamite is perfectly safe and a sure and effective method. Stumps of all sizes and descriptions were removed and in pieces small enough for a boy to handle. This makes the trouble of picking them up such an easy job that any one can do it, while being removed by a stump puller you still have the stump even in worse shape than in the ground. The charges were put off in two ways, first by the old method of fuse and cap and later by the use of a little electric battery which allows several shots to be fired simultaneously. In using the last named method the stumps were shot by placing small charges under several of the roots and bringing the largest stumps out clean. After shooting stumps which had been cut for three years or more the people moved to a newly cleared lot and asked the demonstrator to take out a glade white oak about four feet in diameter. They all expressed a doubt as to the result. Four holes were placed at different points under the roots and there was not a piece of the roots left after the shot.

The spectators next asked to have a standing tree shot out. They picked the tree and it looked as if they had a job set up but after some work in getting the holes in and the demonstator being ready the button on the little battery was pushed and out came the entire tree taking the stump and roots out as clean as though the tree had already been out. This ended the demonstration. During the afternoon 13 stumps and the tree were taken out at an average cost of 24 cents. The cost exclusive of the last two shots would have been about 12 cents per stump. The time consumed was less than six hours. All expressed themselves pleased with the demonstration and there is but little doubt that a stump in the vicinity of Gortner will soon be unknown.

Doing Things Claimed.

Advertising pays and pays good and plenty, writes Milton J. Platt in Fame, if the thing advertised is capable of doing the things claimed for it, and better still if it does a little more. Some articles on which money is spent for publicity go down to oblivion—where they belong—because they offer a yard and deliver only thirty inches. There is no reason for their existence and out they go. The public wont have them. The advertiser wants his money and blames the mediums—the hopeless minority, it may be supposed, judging from the spread of advertising, and the expansion of its influence. The other kind has the call. Doing things, doing things claimed, delivering the goods, they get the popularity. They get advertising compounded—and they deserve it all. Let the disgruntled one sit down and think it over for a moment. If his his head is screwed on right and his gray matter is in working order, he will lose no time in coming to the conclusion that doing things applies as well to things as to men, and that the way to get all that is coming to you is to get busy along the right line.

The Real Teacher.

Happiness, not suffering, teaches us the great lessons of life.

Mrs. Nelle Michael Rathbun.

From the Athens (O.) Messenger of last Thursday the following additional facts concerning the death of Mrs. F. E. Rathbun, of Piedmont, formerly of Oakland, whose demise was noted in the columns last week, is gleaned:

The news of the sad death of Mrs. Nelle Michael Rathbun, aged 26, early Wednesday evening, caused a gloom over this community, in which she had lived for several years, and where she had many friends and acquaintances.

Her death occurred at the home of her aunt, Mrs. L. G. Worstell, where she was brought a month ago suffering with intestinal sarcoma. In December of last year she was taken ill at her home in Piedmont, W. Va. It was speedily seen that her illness was serious. An operation some weeks ago was of no avail. Since her removal to Athens she gradually sank, and for several days the end had been very near. Death relieved her suffering early Wednesday evening.

On Dec. 27, 1905, she married Prof. Franklin E. Rathbun, of Oakland, Md., at the home of Mr. and Mrs. L. G. Worstell, of this city. Since their marriage they have lived in West Virginia, Prof. Rathbun now being superintendant of the public schools. Prior to her marriage, Mrs. Rathbun attended the Athens high school and the Ohio University making her home with her aunt, Mrs. L. G. Worstell. For a time she was employed in the offices of Grosvenor, Jones & Worstell. She was always a popular young woman, and her death is keenly felt by a very large circle of friends.

She is survived by a husband, Prof. F. E. Rathbun; a mother, Mrs. Mary Michael, of The Plains; three sisters, Mrs. M. E. Twiss, of Athens; Mrs Herbert McDonald and Mrs. Edmund Shipley of The Plains; two brothers, Edward C. Michael and Raymond Michael, of The Plains.

The funeral services will be held Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock at the Worstell home, conducted by Rev. Cherrington, asisted by Rev. F. M. Swinehart. Interment will be made in the Union Street cemetery.

Improvements at Deer Park.

Mayor Hennen of Deer Park has secured signers to the petition for natural gas in the town, and everybody is looking forward to its use this coming fall. This will be but the beginning of town improvements in Deer Park to follow the installation of the gas mains.

The removal of fences surrounding dwellings makes a very pretty effect. Dr. Laughlin, Mayor Hennen, Mr. George and Mr. Walter have improved their dwellings in this regard, and other improvements are in contemplation to help the appearance of the town, previous to the opening of the summer season.

CITY ROLLER MILLS.

Mr. and Mrs. H. R. DeWitt spent Tuesday and part of yesterday in Oakland, returning to their home in Hoyes yesterday morning.

Miss Nell Offutt, who spent the winter in Baltimore with relatives and friends, returned to her home in Oakland yesterday morning.

Mr. B. C. Feather who suffered an attack of pneumonia has recovered and was in Oakland last Saturday for the first time since his recent illness.

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Stull returned to their home in Oakland from the South this morning. They spent the winter in Florida and other Southern states.

Major J. M. Burns, of Morgantown, W. Va., spent a day or two at Mountain Lake Park and Oakland this week, returning to Morgantown yesterday afternoon.

Dr. W. W. Davis, superintendent of the Mountain Lake Park Association, is now at the Park, where he is devoting his time in preparing for the coming season there.

Olive and Mary, the little daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Heyward, of Bond, who have been dangerougly ill the past three weeks with typhoid fever, are slowly improving Mrs. C. M. Rathbun, of Mountain Lake Park, who was at Athens, Ohio, attending the funeral of her daughter-in-law, Mrs. F. E. Rathbun, returned to her home at the Park Sunday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred. A Thayer spent Sunday and a part of Monday in Morgantown, W. Va., where they visited their son, Ralph, who is a student in the West Virginia University in Morgantown.

Rev. Alvin Yugel, of Bittinger, and Mr. Lewis Durst, of Jennings, are in Oakland this morning on business connected with the erection of the new Lutheran church at Jennings, which will be constructed of concrete

Mrs. L. B. Hensley, wife of Rev. Hensley, pastor of the Oakland Presbyterian church, who has been ill at the home of her mother in Beverly, W. Va., will be taken to Baltimore this week to undergo a surgical operation. She will be accompanied by Mr. Hensley who will attend the annual Presbytery to be held in that city.

Frederick Livengood, eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Livengood, of Grantsville, Md., stopped off in our town for a while, last Saturday evening while on his way home on a 10-day furlough from "Uncle Sam's" Regular army. "Fred" is in the Heavy Artillery branch of the service, and judging from his strong, healthy appearance, army life must agree with him.—Salisbury Star.

Mr. Charles A. Deffinbaugh, who attended the Grand Lodge Knights of Pythias in Baltimore last week, returned to Oakland Thursday evening. The sessions of the Grand Lodge were quite interesting. Dr. Henry W. McComas, of the local lodge was named as a candidate for Prelate of the Grand Lodge, the election to take place next spring. Two other candidates oppose him, both from Baltimore.

Mr. George W. Legge, Jr., who returned recently to his home in Oakland from Washington, D. C., where he was engaged for a year or more in the legal department of the United States Court of Claims, has decided to locate here permanently for the practice of his profession and has secured well appointed rooms in the First National Bank building for the purpose. Mr. Legge's determination to locate in his home town is a source of gratification to his many friends and all wish him unbounded success.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Hinebaugh left Oakland Tuesday morning for Thomas, W. Va., where they will be the guests for an indefinite time of their son, Mr. Henry Hinebaugh. The many friends of this worthy couple regret to have them leave Oakland. For the past ten years Mr. Hinebaugh was superintendent of the Lutheran Sunday school here and at the session of the school last Sunday morning resolutions appreciative of the good he has accomplished were adopted by the members, all of whom were more or less affected at the leave taking.

Mr. Francis E. Gonder, son of the late Andrew B. Gonder, left Oakland last Friday night for Butte, Montana, where he will engage as a sheep herder on a large sheep ranch in Montana, later embarking in the business himself, to be associated with his brother, Bernard I. Gonder, who is at present a resident of Butte, where he holds a position with one of the Pacific Railroad lines as a telegraph operator. The Messrs. Gonder will acquire a tract of land from the government at the proper time which will be a nucleus for their sheep business. The young men have the best wishes of many friends in Oakland for their success.

Our sedate and taciturn cousins of the British Isles take their sport much too seriously. This is a charge which has been made against Americans by these self-same cousins time without number. But the charge falls flat when one reads of the disorders ensuing upon a game of soccer football in Glasgow. The crowd "surged upon the field," tore up goal posts, set fire to the fence and otherwise disported themselves in most disgraceful fashion, because the players refused to decide a tie. One loses faith in the Saxon cousins, who have so often maintained that they indulge in sport for sport's sake not for the mere opportunity of purpose of winning games. Americans may now feel perfectly justified in mobbing, or even assassinating the umpire whose decisions are tinged with partiality.

Dr. W. W. Davis, superintendant of the Mt. Lake Park Association, spent a portion of the day in the city, looking up some business matters, and while here accorded this office quite a pleasant call. Dr. Davis states that prospects for the success of Mt. Lake Park the coming season are greater than they have been for a number of years past, and that indications now are that there will be more people there, and earlier in the season, than for a number of years. The program for the season has not yet been completed, but a number of the finest attractions have been already secured and contracts are now pending with many other choice attractions. The program will be issued about the middle of May. Dr. Davis also states that the Association hopes to obtain natural gas for use the coming season, which he says will prove a great convenience and comfort to visitors desiring to remain later in the season, but who have heretofore returned to their city homes because of the cold nights and mornings of the fall season.—Grafton Republican.

County Commissioners A. C. Smith and Otho S. Fike, accompanied by Clerk A. G. Ross and Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill went to Baltimore Tuesday where they attended the meeting of the Road Commission and the conference between Governor Crothers and the various boards of County Commissioners of the state. Mr. Hamill's object in visiting the Governor and the Road Commission is to obtain a change in the route selected for the improvements to the county highways under the State Road act, the commission having determined to improve the Old National Road throughout its entire length in the county, thus using Garrett's entire share of the road fund on that one particular road and allowing other roads which are used by the great majority of the tax payers of the county unimproved. The National as far west from the Allegany county line, to Grantsville the people of the entire county want repaired to which proposition no objection has been raised, but to go beyond Grantsville with the road improvement there have been serious objections filed with the Road Commission, hence Mr. Hamills visit in the interests of the people of this section of the county.

ON HIS WAY NORTHWARD.

Rev. J. B. Shoup Will Return to Garrett County in a Few Weeks.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I am just finishing a very pleasant visit of a month with my daughter, Virginia C. Morgan and her precious little family. Rev. Morgan is Synodical Home Mission Secretary of the Lutheran Synod of North Carolina. He is a genuine hustler; has organized four new congregations within two years, and finished a little gem of a church in this growing city of near 15,000 souls.

High Point is a beautiful and interesting town. The name was suggested by the fact that it stands on the highest ground touched by the main line of the Southern Railway between Virginia and South Carolina. The place is noted for turning out more manufactured furniture than any other city in the Union, save only Grand Rapids, Mich. Something more than one hundred concerns engage in this line of manufacture. Many carloads go out daily. A very fine silk-mill is also operated here, besides other minor industries. It is a manufacturing city though not one of the three hundred and more cotton mills in the state is located here. Greensboro, 15 miles north, has the largest cotton mill in the world. Just now one of the most important granite quarries in the country is being put into operation near Salisbury, 35 miles south, and at Gold Hill, nearby, is being opened what promises to be one of the most profitable copper and gold producing mines in America. The area underlaid by these oars is said, indeed found to be, practically unlimited. North Carolina is truly a great state, and wondrously developing.

Grain and grass fields are delightfully green; bloom is well off the fruit trees and corn planting well advanced, though it is noted that the season is quite unusually late.

I expect to reach Carroll county, Md., on the 23rd inst. and get onto the "everlasting hills" of Garrett about May 20.

Allow me to appeal through your columns to my old army comrades about Bittinger to assemble there on the 30th for an all-day Memorial reunion, including bean soup. It will be my last visit with them, and I long once more to give the "friendly hand" to every one of the dear "old boys."

Greetings to all, from the Southland!

J. B. SHOUP.

High Point, N. C., April 19, 1909.

There is no parent worthy of the name but what would like to have their children acquire the habit of reading, because reading opens up to them all the wisdom of the past and present. No matter how ignorant a parent is from an educational point of view, no matter how meager his educational advantages were nor how much he neglected what opportunities he had, he is always proud to see his child show a desire to read. Reading is a habit that must be acquired. To acquire the habit there must be something of interest to start with. Let them have the home paper, where they can read of persons whom they meet and places with which they are familiar, and soon an interest is awakened which increases with every arrival of the local paper. Thus a habit of reading is formed. From the local paper they will turn to that storehouse of information, the public and private library, and become readers all of their lives, and consequently make intelligent men and women, a credit to their ancestors and strong in the knowledge of the world as it is today.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. CHAPTER I.

In Which Begins Adventure.

Some may question the truth of this narrative, yet they will scarcely be found among those who "go down to the sea in ships." To them the unfathomable mystery abiding upon the face of the great deep, the constant marvel of huge, heaving leagues of watery solitude, secret and profound, must ever remain so vast, so inexplicable, as to be beyond any interrogatory of the finite—the strange, the unexpected, lurking everywhere. To others, mere landsmen, confidently imagining that all phenomena can be reduced within the contracted limits of human comprehension, I need say no more than that witnesses still survive to corroborate the principal incidents of this story, which I now purpose writing in the full glow of a memory still dominated by the events to be recorded.

It had come to be the 5th day of April, the year 1879. I, John Stephens, aged 24, occupied a rather comfortable seat upon the shaded balcony of that large, ultra-fashionable hotel at Valparaiso, which, as travelers will recall, clings to the steep hillside overlooking both the city and harbor beneath. I was alone, not having as yet ordered the serving of the evening meal.

A gayly attired military band was playing noisily in a near-by plaza, and through the intervening distance I was able to distinguish plainly the patriotic notes of national music. I even believed that a medley of shouting voices, mingled with an echo of cheers, was borne to me on the rising night wind, and I leaned above the low railing to gaze down, slightly interested, as a regiment of Chilean infantry—regulars of the line, from their white trousers and stiff hats—swept swiftly past the hotel corner in rapid time, to disappear suddenly over the steep crest in the direction of the quay. Far away, toward the right, where the long row of gray-stone barracks was still dimly visible against the darker background of surrounding hills, was to be discerned a glimmer of steel, as squadrons of cavalry and artillery engaged in dress parade, their numerous banners flapping against the sky. At the moment these several occurrences served to awaken the merest interest, tending rather to bring home to memory a freshening knowledge of the desperation of my situation.

It can all be told in few words: I was persona non grata to the Chilean authorities, with apparently every possible avenue leading forth from the country fully and effectively barred. While personally unknown to those officials, thus far successful in masking my movements under the guise of a foreign gentleman of leisure temporarily resident at a fashionable hotel, I nevertheless discovered it impossible to break through the cordon of watchful government spies and shake the Chilean dust from off my feet. A rapid explanation will suffice. A native of Massachusetts, of excellent family connections, together with prospects of future wealth, I early developed the unrestrainable propensities of a rover, and after a vain effort to turn my reluctant ambition toward one of the learned professions my parents, despairing of ever doing better, finally consented to apprentice me to the sea. Unfortunately for the realization of their more secret hopes, I took to that hard, adventurous life as a duck to water, so that, at the end of five years' service, I had risen, through the various grades, to the honorable position of first officer in the old Leyland line, my steamship being the Vulcan, trading between New York and South American ports.

Soon after I attained this berth my father died suddenly, leaving behind him a fair amount of property, a goodly share of which came to me in cash. It chanced that, during a previous voyage, a passenger on board had succeeded in interesting me deeply in certain mining operations which he was conducting under a Bolivian concession. Finding myself in possession of abundant means, and experiencing that occasional disgust for sea life common to all sailor-men, I embarked with boyish enthusiasm in this new enterprise, not only investing a considerable amount of money, but likewise giving the company my personal services as assistant superintendent.

Beyond doubt our concession was an extremely valuable one, but, as we were soon destined to discover, it came to us with an unfortunate flaw in the title, there developing a spirited controversy between the constituted authorities of Bolivia and Chile, over which country the territory involved belonged. From harsh words in public, and the private exchange of diplomatic notes, the argument rapidly advanced to blows, and was finally referred to the arbitrament of the rifle. As our financial interests were entirely Bolivian, and our invested money at stake, it was no more than natural that we should openly ally ourselves with that struggling faction which the Chilean authorities promptly denounced as insurrectos, and proceeded to crush.

It was something of a comic opera war, resulting in two or three skirmishes wherein ill-equipped and poorly officered paisanos were pitted against regular troops of the line, and, as we received from Bolivia no more substantial aid than vague promises, our resistance, though rather stubborn, was soon overcome. When the final wild stampede for safety came, I discovered myself, as quartermaster general of the late revolutionary forces, still in possession of a considerable sum of money, to which no one else possessed any better claim, the unhealed scar of a Chilean bullet in my shoulder, and an exceedingly flattering chance of being summarily shot by drumhead court-martial if caught. All opportunity for retreat across the Bolivian frontier was already effectively blocked, but, after several weeks of excessive hardship, skulking amid the dark recesses of Indian huts in the mountains, I succeeded in stealing unobserved into Valparaiso, feeling confident that, as a sailor, I should be able to discover in that busy seaport some early opportunity for escape.

This confidence was doomed to bitter disappointment. The Chilean authorities were especially desirous of apprehending me, inspired doubtless by visions of the war-chest, rumored to be of far greater value than truth could justify. They were both alert and suspicious. The American consul was obdurate to pleading, refusing peremptorily to become involved in the affair, while no war vessel floating the flag of the United States, to which I might flee for protection, entered the harbor. Manifestly it was impossible for me to depart on any foreign vessel as a passenger without possessing the necessary papers properly vised, nor could I even ship as seaman before the mast without running the gantlet of numerous suspicious officials especially warned to apprehend me. In brief, though possessing ample means, I was a helpless prisoner, my only safety the keeping out of sight from all in authority within the narrow confines of the hotel.

Sitting there in solitude that evening I thought it out all over again for the hundredth time, bitterly cursing myself for a stupid fool, yet utterly unable to discover any venturesome prospect of ultimate escape. I was trapped as securely as though the hand of actual arrest was about to be placed upon my shoulder. I might, by thus continuing to skulk in the dark, delay the result, yet the final ending was inevitable. Beyond doubt I was cornered, and the time was ripe for the eager acceptance of any reckless opportunity. Yet, desperate as I was, I could perceive none; everywhere arose the same blank wall of Chilean power, impassable, unassailable, insurmountable. Saint Andrew! mine was a situation to chill the blood.

The stars began to gleam in the black void of sky overhead, those brilliant, scintillating stars of the south in their unfamiliar constellations, forever reminding me that I was an alien and a stranger. The city itself, wrapped within the deepening folds of this early night mantle, appeared unusually noisy and demonstrative. I dimly wondered at it. There was a ceaseless blare of bands, a medley of inarticulate cries, mingled with the continuous disorder of shuffling feet along the roughly paved streets. I could distinguish nothing definite as I hung curiously over the balcony rail, staring idly down, yet it was plainly evident that the entire population was astir with some increasing excitement. Far out toward the distant mouth of the harbor a fortress battery was firing salvos of artillery, the swift flames of discharge cleaving the black shadows in vicious spurts of yellowish red, the sullen reverberations of sound shaking the hotel casements. Some Holy Saint's day, I imagined, wondering idly what special devotion of the church could be responsible for so much of uproar, so general an outpouring of enthusiasm. Still, the thought held me barely for a moment; my own personal affairs were far too serious and insistent for any wasted attention upon the saints.

I turned back from the rail and glanced carelessly within. The great dining hall was already brilliantly illuminated, and a number of the tables were surrounded by guests. It formed a cosmopolitan scene, the grouped faces being representative of a wide variety of races, the scraps of conversation which floated to me through the open window revealing half the languages of Europe. Swarthy Spaniards, volatile Frenchmen, silent sons of Albion, talkative Yankess, bewhiskered and bespectacled Germans, blonde, rosy-cheeked Swedes, together with representatives from half a dozen South American countries, were indiscriminately mingled in sudden brotherhood. This motley, interesting company was composed principally of men, exhibiting here and there the glitter of military uniforms, or some peculiarity of attire attesting the presence of the inevitable globe-trotter, although the majority were plainly enough commercial gentlemen, interested in various lines of trade, and drawn into this vortex from the four corners of the globe in the wild scramble after gold. No foreign passenger steamer had entered the harbor within the past 24 hours, and I had already studied those faces before in the vague, shadowy hope of discovering a friend. I lit another cigarro, out of sheer nervousness, and sat silently watching a Chinese attendant lighting the colored lanterns suspended along the balcony roof. A sudden rocket went swiftly and sizzling up from out the center of the great plaza below, and my eyes followed its swift flight into the black sky until it burst into a thousand miniature stars.

When I turned once again, now half inclined to beckon a waiter and order the serving of dinner, a newly arrived company of guests had taken possession of the small round table just within the open window. Three were in the party, apparently father, mother and daughter, beyond question of high social class. Paterfamilias, sitting in stately dignity at what might be considered the head of the board, a broad napkin spread across his right knee, was typically aristocratic, of spare figure, stern lean face, with iron-gray hair, and mustaches trimmed to perfect point, his eyes, cold and emotionless, gleaming like steel points behind gold-rimmed glasses—a man certainly over 60, possessing to the extreme that irritating hauteur possible only to an Englishman of recognized family and position. The lady occupying the seat opposite him, whom I naturally presumed to be his wife, was fleshy enough to own an ample double chin, which drooped to a vaster expanse below; most expensively gowned, her fingers laden with diamonds, and a lorgnette at her eye, through which she deliberately surveyed the assembled company. Her evident attempt at duplicating the calm haut-ton of her emotionless companion was nevertheless somewhat of a counterfeit, as it failed to conceal wholly a slight twinkle of amusement curving the corners of her mouth, and a certain slight vulgar uneasiness of manner. His ideal was evidently that of a marble statue, cold, immaculate, his slightest movement revealing the frigidity of one born to the purple, while my lady retained some semblance to flesh and blood, although well veneered by long social artifice. He was nature, while she had evidently been developed by skill; yet the matron, to my thinking, proved far the more interesting specimen of the two.

I must confess, however, wasting precious little attention upon either, for my eyes early rested upon the younger woman seated between the two, and hence directly confronting me. I will not say I never saw a fairer picture of womanhood just when the lovely flower becomes a blossom fully blown, yet assuredly none other ever possessed for me the same indefinable fascination, the same ineffable charm. Twenty-two, possibly, although her age was difficult to guess, with oval face and clear, fresh skin, the rich, red blood of perfect health crimsoning the rounded cheeks; eyes of deepest, darkest gray, the kind of eyes pledging a thoughtful soul behind to yield them such rare power of expression; a face reflecting the joy of living, yet responsive, and, in moments of quietness, saddened beyond its years; an entrancing dimple visible in the rather broad chin; the lips moist and rosy with health, sufficiently parted to reveal a tantalizing glimpse of white, regular teeth behind; the forehead low and broad, the wealth of shadowing hair of darkest brown, yet with an odd gleam of reddish gold causing the gathered masses to seem an aureole of beauty. But it was not the outward face alone, nor any combination of pleasing features, which yielded such rare and indescribable charm—it was rather a distinct and unusual personality which gave to these both life and attractiveness. Her slightest glance or movement, natural and unaffected, seemed a new revelation of self, the outer expression of a secret inward life which I instinctively longed to penetrate, the guarded mystery of which was invitation.

The three conversed little, speaking English with that lack of restraint common to those who have been accustomed to having discreet servants behind their chairs, the man grumbling icily over the quality of food furnished and the indifferent service, my lady commenting with audible distinctness on the personal appearance of the various people present, the girl contenting herself with an occasional monosyllable when directly addressed.

I dispatched my own order, and, while idly waiting the return of the servant, had my attention attracted toward a group gathered about a second table just beyond the one occupied by the English family party.

CHAPTER II.

In Which I Meet His Lordship.

Chilean officers, largely naval, to judge from their rather resplendent uniforms, occupied this second table, and it was evident that they had been drinking to excess. It was their loud voices and boisterous laughter which first attracted my attention, and I soon caught sufficient of their incautious speech to discover they were bantering one among their number to carry into execution a tipsy boast he had just made over the wine. The special officer thus singled out as butt for the boisterous wit of his reckless companions was a naval lieutenant, a rather tall, cadaverous fellow, sallow faced, his short black hair standing erect and bristling, his mustaches drooping so as to shade the corners of his mouth. His cheeks were flushed with temper from the rough sallies at his expense, and his lips uttered a burning Castilian curse, as he arose somewhat unsteadily to his feet, and glared about into the expectant faces of his laughing tormentors.

"Sacro Cristo! you will see, camaradas; you will see!" he declared, bracing himself for the effort. "Caramba! what sailor fears in presence of beauty?—puf! not I."

He turned short about, his sword chains rattling, and strode directly across toward the unconscious Briton, who stared up at him over his roast beef in petrified astonishment. Fumbling awkwardly at his belt, the intruding officer finally brought forth a card, and placed it ostentatiously upon the table, bowing low as he did so.

"I would myself to introduce to the senor," he announced with drunken gravity, and in amazingly broken English. "I Teniente Lootenant Sanchez, Chilean navy; one of the fir-rst family in this country. Maybe you know me, hey? I was with de Almirante Cochrane, when the capitano call on you in the leetle ship. Now I would the bettar-r acq'aintance make with the gr-reat Ingles, an' the ladies, the most boot'ful ladies," and his sunken eyes rested gloatingly on the surprised face of the girl, who had half turned, the better to observe him.

It was all so swiftly, so impudently done that the astounded Briton could only stare, his lean face reddening with annoyance. This hesitancy, as well as something in the constrained attitude of the younger woman, seemed to encourage Sanchez; his expression changed to a satisfied smile, while his lank figure bent in another ceremonious bow, this time directed toward her.

"Ah, I knew it vould so be," he said, insinuatingly. "It vas so I told it to my bravas camaradas. Si, si, it vas so ever—the uniform make us welcome vith the ladies. They lofe the brav'; is it not so, senorita?"

By this time the outraged paterfamilias had stiffened into rock, his eyes cold and hard behind their glasses. In frigid contempt he deliberately turned his back upon the fellow, saying icily:

"You impertinent scoundrel! I am accustomed to selecting my own guests, and you are certainly not one of them."

The Chilean laughed, perhaps not wholly comprehending the words, and remained twisting his mustache between long white fingers. He was far too drunk for fear, besides being upheld by a military contempt for civilians.

"Pah! 'tis a pig of a papa," he sputtered, half turning to witness the approval of his laughing companions behind. "But the smile of beauty still invites, and Juan Sanchez fears not before man or devil."

He strode around the table, his scabbard clanking on the stone floor, drew out the single vacant chair and planted himself in it, his back toward me, his impudent face leering across the white cloth toward the startled, indignant woman seated opposite. I watched her gray eyes widen from astonishment, only to darken with indignation. She pushed back her chair, half rose to her feet, and sank down again, her cheeks flushed, her bosom rising and falling tumultuously. Her evident contempt for the fellow would have utterly crushed any one less befuddled into embarrassed silence. But Sanchez merely grinned, his hands still toying with his mustaches.

"Sangre de Cristo, was it not so, mees?" he questioned, insinuatingly, utterly ignoring the helpless man sputtering at the head of the table, who could only glare at him with open mouth. "The uniform of valor is the best introduction to the favor of the ladies. Si, you vera soon be pretty good amiga of me, the Lootenant Juan Sanchez. I show you the vera best society in Valparaiso, the opera, the grand ball, everything that pleases the senoritas in my country. I have the entree, an' it is easy. I take you to the dance on the warship—bueno! all vera fine. Si, was it not so, mees?"

The young girl, her fine eyes contemptuous and loathing, turned aside from the leering, drunken face confronting her. An instant only her glance rested on the sputtering old man at the head of the table, who could only glare at him with open mouth. "The uniform of valor is the best introduction to the favor of the ladies. Si, you vera soon be pretty good amiga of me, the Lootenant Juan Sanchez. I show you the vera best society in Valparaiso, the opera, the grand ball, everything that pleases the senoritas in my country. I have the entree, an' it is easy. I take you to the dance on the warship—bueno! all vera fine. Si, was it not so, mees?"

The young girl, her fine eyes contemptuous and loathing, turned aside from the leering, drunken face confronting her. An instant only her glance rested on the sputtering old man at the head of the table, then swept, almost beseechingly, about the great room. Apparently no one present had taken the slightest interest in the affair, with the exception of the small party of Chilean officers who were laughing uproariously over their wine, and the girl's gray eyes, now almost black from excitement, came back to her persecutor.

"The dance on the warship, senorita," he insisted, "the gran' dance of my country; it will please you mucho. Dios! w'at care we for papa?"

She perceived me plainly now, leaning forward just outside the window directly behind the fellow's back. I know not what message of encouragement she may have read in my fa but into her eyes there instantly swe a mute, passionate appeal. For the fraction of a moment I hesitated, feeling convinced that any action on my part would only serve to hasten my own fate. Yet it was not in my nature to hold back. Half rising, and bending forward, I reached through the open window, twisted my fingers into the fellow's coat collar, and the next instant he was lying flat upon his back on the balcony floor, nothing remaining to show his recent presence in the dining hall except an overturned chair.

It was rather smartly, prettily done, the astounded lieutenant possessing neither wind nor opportunity for the slightest outcry, and once without, I promptly throttled him, meanwhile muttering a few important admonitions into his ear in well-selected Spanish.

"Lie still there, you drunken idiot. Make another attempt to bite me, and I'll pound your head on these stones. Bah! save your threats, senor, and if you make the slightest uproar I'll hoist you over the railing yonder, and it's 30 feet to the pavement below. Now stand up! Do you see this, senor?" and I pressed the cold muzzle of a revolver against his swarthy cheek. "Oh, you do! Well, you probably know also how it works. Now listen to me—there are stairs at that corner yonder; you go down them quietly and disappear—disappear; do you understand that? If you dare return to that dining room to-night, or attempt again to address that young woman, I am going to kill you, senor."

"Make the Slightest Uproar and I'll Hoist You Over the Railing."

My voice was cold and low, but it carried weight. Panting still from the fierce choking, his eyes hot with anger, his lips trembling, he endeavored to speak.

"Nombre de Dios!" he burst forth at last, his face full of murder, yet standing helpless before my gun-barrel. "I cut your heart out! You insult me, a Chilean sailor. I have revenge for my honor. You fight me for this, senor."

"Oh, certainly, anything to oblige," I returned, indifferently. "Only you get out of here now, and sober up, Sanchez."

"Caramba! you know my name, senor; but I know not yours."

I drew a card from my pocket across which had been written the cognomen I had assumed at the hotel.

"You possess it now," I said somewhat tartly. "Besides, senor, that happens to be my dinner coming yonder, and I prefer eating it undisturbed. You either go down those stairs quietly at once, or I'll kick you down."

I was obliged to smile while watching him back away. Beyond question the fellow was an arrant coward and bully, yet sufficiently angry and outraged to have fought gladly, if only opportunity served. I followed him to the head of the stairs, watching him closely while he descended, cursing fiercely to himself at every step until he finally vanished into the blackness below. The chances were strong that I should hear from him later, but in the meantime my interest veered to the excellent dinner being served. The lieutenant would have his turn, and, perchance, bring me swift release from all my troubles on the morrow.

The English party still remained at their table, lingering over the dessert, but I noticed that conversation had lapsed, and precious little eating was being done. Evidently only the requirements of good form held them to their places, the elderly gentleman especially denoting his nervousness by continual side-glances about the room. I overheard him mutter something indistinctly regarding having left his pistol upstairs, and it was plainly apparent he felt thoroughly ashamed of his late passiveness under insult. Madame was flushed and uneasy, angry still over the episode, and greatly inclined to sputter now that all real danger had passed; but the younger woman merely toyed with her spoon in silence, her eyes downcast, her cheeks devoid of their previous color. She made a fair picture, the

Hunting the Panther

By Frederick R. Toombs

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

IN spite of their natural instincts, many wild animals have at least one redeeming feature. Some can be trained to usefulness; others become pets. Some are majestic to look on; others have edible flesh, or supply valuable ivory, or prove sociable members of the wilderness families, mingling freely with their kind. But the panther is not one of these. The marauding, terrifying night lurking panther that roams the section of Africa where Mr. Roosevelt hunts is 400 pounds of treacherousness and uselessness. He is eight feet of the most vicious qualities of the primeval forest. He is the snarling, gashing, clawing embodiment of all that nature was careless in creating, for he serves no purpose but his destructive own, a clear violation of one of the laws of nature.

Limited largely to night stalking owing to the feline peculiarities of his eyes, which are partially sightless during brighter light, the panther (the largest species of leopard) redoubles his activity at night to make up for the limitations of his "work" by day. The African panther is usually the yellowish, fawn colored brute, with black spots or circles inclosing a spot of brown. The entirely black specimens are the Asiatic breed, and white panthers are rarest of all.

With a long, heavy body; short, muscular legs; thick, powerful necks sharpest of teeth and claws and thick skulls, the African panther is a prowling, leaping arsenal of nature's effective weapons. Some of his flying leaps measure forty feet and over, and he lands on all fours, with gleaming teeth and bared claws, which sink inches deep into his doomed prey. On striking down man or beast he immediately tears open the unprotected abdomen to feed on the liver, heart, kidneys, etc.

Mr. Roosevelt will find the panther especially difficult to kill for several reasons—viz, his agility in climbing among trees, his stealthiness in the bush, his nocturnal habits, the rapidity of his jumps, the fear of the native gun carriers and assistants and the smallness of the beast's vital organs, thus particularly difficult to reach with a bullet. The heart and lungs are very small and surrounded by thick fat, and the brain is small, incased in hard bone; also his way of living is very irregular, there being no especial kind of place where he can usually be found at particular times, thus differing from many other animals. Like all huge jungle cats, the panther is a most dangerous object when in his convulsive death throes.

Mr. G. P. Sanderson, an acknowledged English authority, states that the panther is a more dangerous opponent than the tiger of Bengal, as he is roused with less provocation and is more courageous and versatile in attacking his disturbers. Sportsmen look for him in rocky hills covered with scrub or along waterways, where the temperature is more even, and in India often lure him within range of guns by tying a goat or a dog to a stake or tree. The panther's fondness for dog meat results in a dearth of canines in villages.

It is of course owing to his eye weakness that the panther rarely makes an attack between 9 o'clock in the morning and 6 o'clock at night. If you meet him by chance within this interval of time, since he is not sure of his sight, he turns tail at the slightest sound and runs to hide in the thickest part of the jungle, but he seldom goes very far. Believing himself well concealed, he crouches behind a thicket, with his head on his fore paws, in the position of a cat on the watch. Woe to you if you pass within the range of one of his bounds! You will have him on your back. On foot or on horseback you will not escape him.

An unwounded panther uses his teeth only on cattle, but when he is hunted or crosses a man on his path he easily inflicts blows with his claws sufficiently powerful to completely destroy the face and usually cause death. When he is wounded he uses both claws and teeth and falls upon man with a fury that is terrible. The panther stretches himself against the tree trunks to sharpen his claws.

A venturesome Frenchman, M. Bourbonvel, has written at length of his experiences in panther hunting. He states that the leopards teach their young how best to kill their prey by a system of lessons, just as a hawk teaches its young to fly.

He says: "From birth to the age of ten months or a year, the time when the mother abandons them, the kittens live only upon animals that have been captured by their mother. They have never yet made an attack themselves, but have received valuable lessons, having looked on at more than one scene of carnage. I have seen little panthers of the size of a dog watching calmly and observing closely while their mother strangled an antelope."

When the panther has reached the age of eight or ten years he has reached his full size and strength, and then the hunter must approach him most gingerly. No longer content with catching the wild boar, he attacks cows, horses, oxen and camels. No creature can resist him. Unless hunted he seldom attacks a man beyond the range of his leap. But within that limit he falls upon every moving thing indiscriminately without foresight or examination. If a locomotive should pass within this limit of distance I am absolutely certain that it would be attacked by an old panther.

He is very dainty in regard to his food, cares only for warm and bleeding flesh and refuses to touch a creature found dead. Only young, very feeble ones do it, who lack strength and cunning to attack big game. An adult beast almost never eats the remnants of his victim. He often keeps them, hoping they will be good next day, but, finding the meat cold, turns away without touching it. Sometimes he makes use of these fragments as a sort of bait.

If the panther is hunting and wishes to take a victim by surprise he crawls like a serpent. His agility and cunning render him formidable. After satisfying his appetite he continues taking life for pleasure, and it has often been observed that he was unable to eat a tenth part of the domestic animals he killed. It is impossible to form a just idea of the loss he causes to the tribes whose territory he exploits.

At the sight of dead bodies he rouses to fresher animation and ardor. He has often been seen after having brought down a hunter and laid open his skull to leave him and then to return and lay open the chest of the body lying dead on the ground. One of those agile quadrupeds one day darted in among a herd of antelopes near Lake Isolt, in Uganda, and killed twenty-seven of them.

The panther is naturally extremely tenacious of life. Those who have most closely studied his ways and habits assure us that he does not succumb immediately to the wound of a bullet that has pierced his heart. He must have in this respect the privilege of the lion. Other hunters bear witness that many of these animals after receiving five or six balls in the body have still struggled for a long time and died only by a slow agony.

A German sportsman succeeded in one of his hunts in getting possession of a very young panther, of which he tried to make a pet.

But one day when they had taken him into the forest he was long in returning to his masters, and two servants were sent to learn what had become of him. The panther sprang on them, threw them both to the ground and tore their bodies open.

Subtle, swift and sinister, the panther has a fiendish fondness for torturing his victims, beast or human. He will play with a half dead man like a cat with a broken winged bird. Having crushed down a native, the panther will spring into the bushes and hide. The unfortunate, thinking his enemy gone, essays to rise or crawl away, only to be suddenly struck to earth again, to be fought over by jackals, hyenas and vultures.

M. Jacques Arago, a scholar and traveler of European celebrity, thus draws the portrait of the panther:

"Is that a tiger, a lizard, a serpent or a lion which so devoured space? Is it a flame whose movement flashes with the rapidity of thought? It is the panther in quest of his prey; it is the nimblest, the most agile of the quadrupeds that the hunter pursues. Your ball must fly swiftly to overtake him. The arrow is not so swift as he. And how is it possible to strike that elastic body which stretches out, curves, bends about, shortens?

"How seize on the moving being to which all quiet is impossible, which is refreshed by motion, enervated by calm and sleep?

"You aim at the earth. The panther you thought to strike with an infallible missile draws your eyes above your head to see him. He does not go on feet; he flies.

"It is the panther rather than the lion or the tiger who should be known as the king of beasts."

More silent than other dangerous beasts, the panther so contributes to the perplexities of his pursuers. His cry, infrequently heard, is a harsh noise, something between a grunt and a cough. He emits a short roar at times when charging an assailant. While difficult for parties to circumvent, panthers are less suspicious of traps than lions, etc., and they are often caught in baited cage traps.

A writer in the American Field describes a thrilling panther hunt in British East Africa, northwest of Entebbe, illustrating the brute's agility, resourcefulness and tenacity to life.

"We were following elephant tracks into a thicket of 'wait a bit' brushes (so named because of the annoying thorns) when a large leopard sprang in front of us," he says.

"Burns, who was in the lead, took a shot at him, but scored a clean miss on account of his pony rearing to the side. I noticed the brute make for a bush to the right of us, so we started after him on foot, leaving George to look after the ponies. Suddenly up jumped the leopard about twenty yards from us. We both fired together, and the brute made a leap as if hard hit. Burns was about six yards to the right of me when he cried out:

"'Look out, kid!'

"But before I had time to look the leopard sprang and floored me like a tenpin, knocking my rifle from my hands. He sprang from the left side, so my right arm was free. As luck would have it, my knife was on the right side of my belt. Drawing it, I let the savage brute have its point clean in his snout just as he was in the act of clawing at my throat. Burns, who had fixed his bayonet, came to my assistance. The brute thought it best to clear out.

"After creeping fifteen yards Burns pointed to a bush, and there I saw the old fellow lying down, evidently in great pain. He would keep getting up and lying down, all the time licking his side where the wounds were. This time we decided to have a good broadside at him, so crept to the left, taking care not to let the animal see us. When we got between fifty and a hundred yards from him we had a good view and watched his antics. Then, leveling our rifles, we fired together. The leopard sprang up, leaped about twelve feet and rolled over on his side. I was about to make a run up to him when old Burns luckily dragged me back, for just then up jumped the leopard and cut some of the queerest capers I ever saw. Leaping suddenly toward us in a last try for revenge, he presented as fearful a sight as I ever want to see.

"Burns let him have another shot in his side, at which he made a leap in the air and came down all of a heap, dead.

"It is seen that it took five well aimed bullets from guns designed for elephant and lion killing, in addition to my knife thrust, to lay low that brute."

To pay this amount it was ascertained that the taxable property as shown by the assessment books amounts to $8,491,012, which at $1.02 on the $100, will make the above amount for county purposes; $86,608.32.

Deducting $728,314 for Corporations paying direct to the State Treasurer, leaves the basis $7,762,698 at 16 cents on each $100, makes $12,420.32, and this added make the taxes for state and county purposes $99,028.64.

Sun Life Assurance Co., of Canada, Head Office Montreal.

Two Letters Proving Conclusively the Benefits of the Non-Forfeiture Clause of the Sun Life Policies.

No. 1.

Cumberland, Md., Nov. 11, 1908.

Mr. F. W. Claybrook, Jr., District Manager, Sun Life Assurance Co., of Canada, Cumberland, Md.

Dear Sir:—Allow me to thank you Company through you for their kindness in automatically advancing the third year's premium on my son's policy No. 120813, now due.

Owing to illness he has been unable to engage in his usual vocation and it is indeed gratifying to know that his policy contains the AUTOMATIC NON-FORFEITURE CLAUSE, which guarantees to continue the policy in force so long as the reserve on same lasts. This provision allows me sufficient time to secure the premium and the policy will not lapse on account of the non-payment of the premium.

Wishing for your Company much continued prosperity, etc., I am,

Very truly yours,
MRS. MARY A. DOERNER.

No. 2. (Five months later)

Cumberland, Md., April, 6th, 1909.

Mr. F. W. Claybrook, Jr., District Manager, Sun Life Assurance Co., of Canada, Cumberland, Md.

Dear Sir;—I desire to thank your Company through you for their promptness in settling the Death Claim under policy No. 120813 on the life of my late son Weyland Joseph Doerner. The check in full settlement of this claim was received by me within ten days after the completion of the papers. I also wish to express my appreciation for the courtesy of your office, which relieved me of all worry and expense at the time of my bereavement by the individual attention you gave to adjusting all matters conductive to the very prompt settlement made.

Wishing for the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada much coutinued success and prosperity, I am

Very truly yours,
MRS. MARY A. DOERNER.

TWO VALUABLE HORSES KILLED ON RAILROAD

Near Big Youghiogheny Bridge Last Sunday Morning by Freight Train.

Last Sunday morning about 5 o'clock a west bound freight train drawn by engine No. 1803, ran down and killed two horses belonging to Mr. George Geissman, of Oakland. The animals had been in pasture on the Welch farm, west of Oakland, but had escaped from the field and strayed upon the track near the Washington Spring crossing.

When the train which caused the death of the animals arrived at the crossing it is apparent, from tracks made alongside the railway, that the animals were grazing nearby and they became frightened and started to run between the rails. Thus they ran in front of the engine until the Yough bridge, which is an undertruss structure and covered only with the ties and rails, was reached. When the horses attempted to cross the bridge their legs went into the openings between the ties and the engine struck them, killing both instantly and carrying one beyond the bridge after severing its body in twain.

Railroad employes had the animals appraised by disinterested parties who placed the damages sustained at $400. Mr. Geissman has filed a claim with the railroad officials for the amount he deems the animals were worth and he hopes to be reimbursed.

MAY METEOROLOGY

Month Will Glow With Sunshine and Be Free from Frost.

Peter R. Smith forecasts the weather for May as follows:

The storm exciting causes for the month of May are much lessened this year over what they were for the past several Mays. Hence causes denote it a bright, rosy month, glowing with sunshine. And, indeed, even in the cyclonic belts these destructive storms will be much reduced in force. The causes which bring about frost are at a minimum. If any frost should appear it will be light. May will have refreshing showers, which will be followed by cooler conditions. May will open with a rain on her border in western and central parts.

On the last day of April a warm wave will be developed, bringing on cloudiness and rain. The wave on its passage will break and form electric showers in many places as it moves on eastward. Fair, cooler weather will follow.

A wave of disturbance will be central on the 6th. The period will start with a warm wave on the 5th. Cloudiness and rain will be on transit, passing east on the 6th, 7th and 8th. A change to fair, cooler weather will follow the western flank of the wave, which may be cool enough for frost.

A storm period comes on the 11th, 12th and 13th. A change to warmer will be experienced on the 10th, and on the 11th and 12th thundershowers will materialize. On or about the 14th cooler weather will prevail. There should be no alarm at this time of frost danger. If any it will be very light.

A change to much warmer will be experienced on or touching the 15th, which will develop a storm wave that will be in force to the 19th. A series of thunder showers of much strength will prevail generally at this period in most parts of the country. After the passage of the wave it will be much cooler on or about the 19th.

A storm period is central on the 23d, 24th, and 25th. Thundershowers will develop and in places storms of wind will show up with much vigor. Thick cloudiness and light rains will materialize on the storm days generally.

The last period is central on or touching the 29th, which is likely to bring several stormy days touching the 29th. The storm wave is likely to break up into thundershowers, which may daily appear to June 1 or 2.

SHEEP KILLING DOGS DEPLETING FARMERS' FLOCKS

Inroads Made Upon the Fold of Mr. T. W. Casfeel Who Sustained Much Loss

The business of sheep raising in Garrett county will never be a profitable undertaking until some means has been devised to rid the country of the hordes of worthless dogs which roam at will, seemingly ownerless, over all sections of the county, destroying sheep and the sheep industry which would, with the proper protection against the mauraudering of these animals, become not only a business of profit but one which would add untold wealth to the county and open a way for the employment of labor.

In the past years the number of sheep killed by dogs in the immediate vicinity of Oakland is almost countless. One farmer has lost hundreds of dollars worth and as a result he is determined to dispose of his remaining sheep, and go out of the business—driven out, we may say, by worthless dogs.

In recent years however, the attacks upon the sheep folds of the farmers have been few, but last week a new outbreak occurred when two dogs were seen worrying a flock of sheep belonging to Mr. T. W. Casteel and before the animals were driven off they had killed a valuable ewe and crippled some eight or ten other sheep belonging to Mr. Casteel.

Mr. Casteel is naturally indignant over his loss and has no recourse to recover damages as he is uniformed as to the ownership of the dogs and was not able to recognize them.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MISS MARGARET COMBS.

Miss Margaret Combs, aged 29 years, daughter of Mr. John S. Combs, died this morning at 9:30 o'clock at her home in Carpenter's Row, Ridgeley, after a lingering illness of tuberculosis. She leaves her father, two brothers, William S. Combs, of Newark, Ohio, and Frank B. Combs, of this city, and three sisters, Blanche, Pearl and Dewetta all at home. —Cumberland Times. Miss Combs was a daughter of John S. Combs, formerly editor of the Mountain Democrat.

REV. GIDEON J. FERGUSON.

Died, at his home, Elder Hill, on Monday last, after a protracted illness due to extreme old age and as the result of a stroke paralysis suffered more than a year ago, Rev. Gideon J. Ferguson, aged more than eighty years. The deceased was a local minister of the M. E. church for half a century and was a man of true Christian principles. His funeral took place at Hoyes on Wednesday.

NATURAL GAS COMPANY WANTS MORE PLEDGES

Correspondence Between The Republican and Gas Company's Manager.

Franchises for the laying of natural gas mains into Deer Park and Loch Lynn Heights were obtained by the representatives of the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Company on last Thursday morning and afternoon and on Thursday night at a special meeting of Oakland's council an ordinance granting the gas company the right to lay and maintain gas mains under the streets and alleys of the town was presented. While the franchise was not granted at this meeting it was passed at a meeting of the Mayor and Council on Friday night, giving the gas company rights and privileges for a term of forty years, during which time the rates to be charged for the product of the gas company is not to exceed at any time the price of fifty cents per thousand cubic feet.

The gas company having thus secured franchises with the right to lay and maintain service pipes in the towns of Deer Park, Loch Lynn Heights and Oakland, THE REPUBLICAN desirous of obtaining from the superintendent of the gas company information as to the probable date when gas may be expected to be delivered to the residents of the towns above named, addressed the following letter to Mr. J. D. Northrup, general superintendent of the gas company at Cumberland:

Office of THE REPUBLICAN,
OAKLAND, MD., April 26, 1909.

J. D. Northrup, Esp., Gen'l Manager, West Va. and Maryland Gas Company, Cumberland, Md.,

DEAR SIR:—As a matter of public interest to the people of Oakland and other communities in this section of Garrett county who are extremely anxious for information, from an official source, will you kindly state for publication in the next issue of The Republican, when, in your opinion, will the gas line be laid to supply the residents of the various towns who have agreed to become subcribers of the company you represent, or, if the matter has not yet been determined by your officials what further step would you suggest be taken by our residents to insure the speedy and I trust, favorable action on the part of the Gas Company?

An early answer will be appreciated.

Very truly yours,
BENJ. H. SINCELL,
Pub. The Republican.

To the above letter Mr. Northrup replied as follows, which is self explanatory, and the success of the movement to have gas brought to Oakland depends very much upon the future efforts of our own residents in this direction:

WEST VIRGINIA AND MARYLAND GAS COMPANY
CUMBERLAND, MD, April 27, 1909.

Benj. H. Sincell, Publisher, The Republican, Oakland Md.,

DEAR SIR: Your valued favor of the 26th inst. is before me and I thank you for addressing us on the subject referred to, and am pleased to make reply for publication as you desire.

When we first took up the matter of the extension of our gas line system to Oakland and other towns in your vicinity, which we did at the earnest solicitation of prominent citizens in Terra Alta, the Board of Trade and others in your city, we had some doubts that a sufficient number of consumers could be secured owing to the investment necessary, but it is only fair to state that we are very much gratified with the interest and wide-awake spirit developed in your city and other towns mentioned in taking hold of this matter, which reflects great credit on your progressiveness. While it is quite true that we have not yet secured a sufficient number of contracts to warrant our going ahead with such construction, but the number we have received leaves but little doubt in our minds but what your different solicitors will secure the required number. Therefore towards that end we have taken franchises in a number of the towns, as well as had a number of routes surveyed from which we expect to select a final one and in other ways have gone ahead and made considerable expenditure.

The exact time in which we would start this work must necessarily depend on how soon the different solicitors may be able to secure the additional signers. We would, therefore, request that the different organizations and committees from these different towns redouble their efforts toward soliciting and be able to place these additional contracts in our hands without delay, after which we can assure you work of construction will start just as soon as it is possible to gather together the necessary material, etc.

Thanking you for the kindly interest you have shown in this matter by addressing us, I remain,

Very truly yours,
J. D. NORTHRUP,
Gen'l Supt.

Church To Be Improved.

Members of the Oakland Presbyterian church are making arrangements to improve both the interior and exterior of their house of worship. The interior walls will be redecorated and probably new windows substituted for those now in service. The pews will be reoiled and a new carpet laid. The outside woodwork will be repainted and some improvements made to the lawn surrounding the edifice. While these improvements are under way no interruption will occur in the services of the congregation as the Lutheran church has been placed at the disposal of the Presbyterian membership as well as the Sunday school, the latter meeting at the usual hour in the Lutheran Sunday school room every Sunday afternoon.

Dog Poisoner at Work.

During the past week or ten days quite a number of dogs in and about Oakland have been poisoned. That Oakland can every well spare many of the worthless animals no one will dispute, but the manner that has been employed by the unknown distributor of poison does not appeal to the average person as being humane or the proper mode of procedure.

THE WHEELING BUSINESS MEN ENJOYED THEIR VISIT

Came to Oakland Last Thursday Afternoon on a Special Train.

Last Thursday afternoon the special train bearing represenatives of the various wholesale and manufacturing interests of Wheeling arrived in Oakland about two o'clock and was met at the station by a large number of the local business men, the City band and a delegation of the Oakland Board of Trade.

The visitors as soon as they arrived were escorted from the station to Second street and thence to the court house where a public reception was tendered them, the band meanwhile playing a number of selections.

After a brief inspection of the new building and a visit to the merchants by individual members of the excursion party they returned to the station and went from here to Grafton.

The visitors expressed their high appreciation at the reception accorded them by the people of Oakland and regretted that they could not spend more time here. They promised, however, that on their next annual trip arrangements would be made for a longer stop in Oakland, many of the gentlemen of the party being quite enthusiastic over the location of Oakland and its general air of progressiveness.

GORTNER.

Owing to the extreme wet weather of the past few weeks the farmers have been considerably delayed with their spring work.

Messrs. Evans and Kessel, of Eastern Virginia, were in this vicinity last week where they purchased a large drove of cattle.

Artie Dodge and sister, Miss Cora, were pleasant callers at the home of D. M. Schrock Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. John Wamsley, of near Keyser, W. Va., are on an extended visit to their uncle, Chas. Wamsley, at this place.

Bliss Baker was calling on friends at Brookside, W. Va., last Sunday.

A. W. Killius spent Sunday last with relatives at Oak Grove, Md

L. S. Swartzentruber is building an addition to his brick yards at this place.

Services at the Union Church next Sunday as follows: Sabbath school at 9:30. Preaching at 10:30 a. m. and at 7 p. m. Everybody invited to attend.

Call for Your Letters.

Mr. John C. Brooks, Mr. J. G. Cubberly, Mrs. Stella Gilpin, Miss Carrie Johnson, Mrs. J. W. Lord, Mrs. Wm. R. Savadge, Mr. W. R. Savedge, Mr. Charles Welch.

H. C. SINCELL, THE FAMILY OUTFITTER

When a man invests his money in Clothing he usually looks for the best he can procure for his money. While it is wise economy to buy everything of the best you can make no mistake in buying such Clothes as Hart, Shaffner & Marx, or the Collegian kind. While these are the best Clothes, they do not cost any more than the ordinary kind you buy in other stores. This season we are showing a stronger line than ever before, embracing all the new shades of Green as well as the standard Blue and Black, made in twenty different models.

THE SUNSHINE SUITS for Women have given satisfaction for 10 years, and this season they are far in advance of any we have ever before shown. We have many suits the same style as this cut at $12.

We show every imageable color and style of Hat for Men and Boys at prices from 50 cents to $3.00.

Our store was never so attractive as now. Every department is well stocked with the new and stylish wearing apparel for Men, Women and Children.

We show every imaginable color and style Hat for Men and Boys, at prices from 50 cents to $3.00.

To pay this amount it was ascertained that the taxable property as shown by the assessment books amounts to $8,491,012, which at $1.02 on the $100, will make the above amount for county purposes; $86,608.32.

Deducting $728,314 for Corporations paying direct to the State Treasurer, leaves the basis $7,762,698 at 16 cents on each $100, makes $12,420.32, and this added make the taxes for state and county purposes $99,028.64.

A. G. Ross, Clerk.

No Time to Waste Money-Making.

Agassiz, when a friend expressed surprise that a man of his genius should remain contented with the moderate income which a college professorship brought, said: "I have no time to waste in making money. Life is not long enough to enable a man to get rich and do his duty by his fellow men at the same time."

The Realm of the Possible.

The realm of the possible was given to man to hope, and not to fear in. . . . If (in sorrow) the thought strikes you that we are punished for our sins—mourn for them, and not for the happiness which they have prevented. Rather thank God that he has stopped us in time, and remember his promises of restoring us if we profit by his chastisement.—Charles Kingsley.

Too Great a Strain.

Every once in a while the actor while taking the part of a dude in a play would spend large sums of his stage money. On one of these occasions it seemed too much for a certain person in the audience, when a voice rang shrill and clear through the house: "Hey, Bill, how about that five you owe me?"

A Prayer.

Teach us to know the healing influence of beauty, and so to realize the insidious evil of all that mars the landscape; comprehending, too, that ugliness, wherever found, is opposed to the harmonious development of man's thought and to the design of Thy creation.—Edward Irving Farrington.

The Difference.

"It's funny what a difference it makes," said the woman, "whether we are eating dinner with the man in the little blue kitchen, or at a table d'hote. If he feeds his ear with his spoon in the little blue kitchen we go into fits, but look at him now! Eating his spaghetti with his bread stick and wiping his fingers on the table cloth, and I don't care at all. Do you?"

Divine Right of Kings.

The divine right of kings is a doctrine promulgated in England in the seventeenth century, which asserts that kings held their authority by divine appointment and as earthly representatives of the deity. This doctrine relieved the sovereign of all responsibility toward his subjects and gave him absolute claim to their obedience.

Right!

Does it do any good to worry? It does. It gives the doctor a chance to earn the price of a meal ticket, the maker of dyspepsia dope a chance to work off his truck upon your system, and eventually it gives the grave-digger a job. Of course it pays to worry. —Los Angeles Express.

His Opera Hats.

One of the most consistently dressed men in the world lives in New York and is seen frequently at the opera. When a work by a French composer is given he always wears an opera hat he bought in Paris, and when they give Italian operas his tile bears the label of a hatter in Milan.

The Stumbling Block.

"I'd tell my friends frankly of all my faults," says the Philosopher of Folly, "but for one thing. They'd believe what I told 'em."

Therefore Be Cheerful.

German proverb: A happy heart is better than a full purse.

SOME EVILS OF THE SALOON.

It Is a Corrupter of Politics and Makes People Immoral and Criminal.

The chief evils of the New York saloon to-day, according to A. H. Gleason, in his article in Collier's Weekly, are:

1. It corrupts the police force.
2. It offers hospitality to crime and criminals.
3. It forms an alliance with politics.
4. It concentrates the social evil.
5. It sells impure and injurious drinks.

These evils pertain to saloons not only in a great city but in smaller places. The principal reason, says he, for the existence of these evils is that the average saloon, if run straight and in accordance with the law, would not pay expenses. So the dealer supports his family on the profits of illegitimate side lines.

Terrible are these side lines, and yet if the saloonkeeper tries to obey the law he not only suffers loss in his business but is hounded by others in the calling, and made to suffer in still other ways. The dealer who tries to be upright has a hard time of it. He gets but little sympathy, and the way is so rough that he is likely to give up and say in despair: What is the use of my trying to run this business different from the way other men run it?

Some of the revelations of the doings of the saloon are so frightful that they seem incredible. Thus it is declared that certain New York saloons have supplies of chloral hydrate on hand to administer to unsuspecting persons who have been beguiled there for purposes of robbery or worse.

Some saloons are so frequented by criminals that the stranger who drops in for a drink may not get out again easily.

Then also there are other places where the liquids sold as whiskey and brandy are wood alcohol mixed with strong drugs for color and flavor.

The indictment presented by this article in Collier's is so dreadful that we might think its writer was drawing upon his own imagination if he did not give the dates and figures.

Sodom and Gomorrah?

Were worse conditions there than in some of our modern Christian cities?

The difference is that nearly all the people in those old time places were satisfied to have the evil stay, but, thank God, some in our modern cities are doing all they can to have it go.

LOST THROUGH DRINK.

Sad History of a Young Men's Club—One Saw His Peril and Quit.

Forty years ago, in a certain college, six young men formed themselves into a society, partly literary and partly for "good fellowship." They were all good writers, and at their weekly meeting each had a composition of his own. Then they all drank together, until they were hardly able to find their way to their rooms.

One of those men has recently told a friend that, after three or four months of this association, he discovered that from a condition in which he had to force himself to drink, having no natural taste for liquor, he found that he was getting to like it, and to long for it, and he had common sense enough to cut himself loose at once from his "club" membership. The others went on, and the annals of our colleges contain no sadder story than theirs. One of them died in New York a few years ago, noted for his wit and his learning, but a slave to his appetite. It was said that every night he retired to his library and, with a bottle beside him, drank himself into unconsciousness. At the early age of 38 he was found there one morning dead.

Another one walks the streets of the metropolis, picking up an uncertain living with his once brilliant pen. His face and person are revolting to behold, his clothes are in tatters, he has lost all self-respect and honor—a shame and a disgrace to his college and his country.

Two of the others lived in obscurity until they were past 30, when they dropped into drunkards' graves. The one who broke off was the only one who has ever arrived at distinction or has been of any service to the world.

Liquor Revenue on the Decrease.

According to figures given out recently by the chairman of the national Prohibition party in the United States, a remarkable decrease in the production and sale of intoxicating beverages throughout the whole of the United States, took place during the recent months of July and August. Nearly $1,000,000 a day is the estimated decrease, which is based on official figures received from the internal revenue department at Washington.

Against the Drink Evil.

The latest reform bills introduced into the legislature by the prohibitionists of Norway include a provision against the playing of musical instruments in liquor resorts. The provision reads: "No musical instrument shall be played in any public house, concert hall, or resort where liquor is sold, since music promotes drinking." A further clause is directed against the use of the mails to circulate periodicals containing liquor or beer advertisements.

TURPENTINE AND ROSIN

Something About Their Making and Their Use.

Turpentine and rosin. The naval stores of the world.

The South has a monopoly of something else than cotton. From the great turpentine camps of the Southern States goes the enormous quantity of turpentine and its various products that supply the bulk of the world with naval stores.

Turpentine comes from the long-leaf pine tree, one of the most valuable trees of the forest. Long leaf pine is the excellent timber that is called in some sections the North Georgia pine, because the mills of Georgia send a large amount of sawed lumber to Northern markets.

The long-leaf pine tree is tall, clean and imposing, and cuts out a high proportion of sound and enduring lumber, which takes a nice finish and is valuable for many things in building. Unfortunately for the timber crop, the long-leaf pine is also the turpentine tree, and the production of turpentine is the ruination of the forest.

No other of the pine family is more stately or handsome than the long-leaf pine, with its needles that sometimes exceed a foot in length. A forest of long-leaf foliage waving against the sky gives the appearance of a gigantic lacework thrown over the tree tops, and is very striking to the visitor who sees it for the first time.

The man who has a turpentine forest does not look much at the lacework of the tree tops. He is more concerned in the bottom of the tree trunk, which yields him his living. In the spring—

The turpentine man gets an axe that is made in Ridgway, Pa., and cuts in each side of the pine tree a deep pocket that he calls a box. It will hold about a quart. Then he scarifies the side of the tree a foot or two up the trunk that it may bleed. When this is done the tree begins to exude the sticky fluid that the stranger calls pitch, and which the turpentine man calls turpentine. It is turpentine. Pitch is a wholly different substance.

The turpentine dribbles slowly down the peeled surface of the tree and finally fills up the box at the bottom. From the box it is dipped into buckets and carried away to barrels, and from the barrels it goes to the stills. The job of gathering the crude turpentine is quite on a parallel with the maple sugar operations of the North, except that turpentine is woefully sticky. Molasses is smooth and unctuous beside turpentine.

From the woods to the still it is a sticky job, and at the still is a big tank encased in brick, with a fireplace below, and a long copper worm leading from the vat through a condensing chamber holding cold water. The distilling is much the same whether it is turpentine, whiskey, crude oil or anything else.

As the fires burn beneath the tank, the material to be distilled gives off a vapor that is carried through the worm and condensed in the cold water. The liquid that flows from the worm in the turpentine still is the spirits of turpentine of the drug store and the paint shop.

After the turpentine is distilled off, a residuum is left which is rosin. Rosin is about as widely used as turpentine, and the chief supply of the world is found in the stills of the South. You can't solder a can, or wax the stick of a fiddle without paying a tribute to the pine forests of Dixie.

A few years ago the fire department in Pittsburg saw a fierce black smoke coming from the second or third story of a building down on Third avenue, and there was a hurried scurry of engines to the scene. When they were ready to turn on the water, they got ready to go back to the engine house again, for the fire was not one to put out. A curious chap by the name of Weed had a furnace set up and was making a fire of some North Carolina pine knots under a tank that contained some more North Carolina pine knots, and he was hunting for a way to distill turpentine from the dead tree trunks and old knots found so abundantly in this section.

Others had tried the same thing but without success. Weed boiled his pine knots in melted rosin, and procured by the operation a fine yield of a peculiar turpentine spirit which differed in some respects from the spirit distilled from the crude turpentine from boxed trees. This new spirit was named spiritine, and it is sold in large quantities, for Weed had discovered a gold mine. All through the South spiritine plants are in operation now, utilizing the old dead pine, and turning out thousands of gallons of spiritine.

Weed went into the question of further products, and separated his spiritine into simpler elements getting many valuable products, for turpentine is one of the hydrocarbon compounds made of up two or three of theoriginal elements in such a way as to be capable of splitting up into many other things as coal tar is.

Poor old Weed. He had fooled around with the experimental work in Pittsburg and down here a long time before he got it to move, and many a time I dropped in at his place in Pittsburg to note his progress and to lie about North Carolina with him. He finally made a success, and then he came to this section and built his stills on a successful commercial basis, and for a little while he had to juke to keep the dollars from rolling over him. Then when things were coming his way fate played it rough with him, and Weed died. That thing gave me a jolt for two reasons, one because I liked him, and the other because it is tough to see a man make an uphill fight for years, and then just as he gets to the top of the hill and has caught his breath to find old grim Death standing at the door. That is one reason I was always a staunch partisan of Moses. There was a great leader and a great man, possibly the greatest the world has produced. But when he finished his half century of struggle, leading his people onward through every conceivable difficulty, he looked down into the promised land from the summit of the mountains and yielded up the ghost. And in the land of the vale of Moab they made him a sepulchre which is to this day unknown and lonely.

Odds fish. Moses was not connected with the turpentine trade, and has no particular place in this story.

Turpentining inflicts such ugly wounds on the pine trees that their growth is checked, and after a few years the lumberman comes and cuts them down. It is not a very noble end for a most noble tree, but if you ever felt your foot move uneasily when the fiddle began to turn out the Virginia reel or Money Musk you know that the pine tree must provide the rosin. So let it go at that.

PRESENTED WITH PURSE OF GOLD

Mr. Jacob Brown 85 Years Old Last Wednesday.

From the Cumberland Times of April 7.

Mr. Jacob Brown, the nestor of the Allegany County Bar, is 85 years old today, and a pleasing incident in connection with the event was a testimonial on the part of the members of the Allegany County Bar Association, at which time Mr. Brown was presented with a purse of gold.

The meeting of the Bar Association took place this morning at 10 o'clock in the bar association's room in the court house.

The meeting was presided over by Mr. F. C. Hendrickson, president of the association, who, upon calling the meeting to order, referred briefly but kindly to the event which had called the members of the association together; and then called upon any member of the bar who desired to say anything.

Mr. James W. Thomas then paid a beautiful tribute to the worth and integrity of Mr. Brown, and closed by saying that he hoped that the evening of his life would be rounded out in that happy manner which had marked its morning and mid-day.

Mr. Thomas was followed by Captain Robert H. Gordon, who referred eloquently to the long career of Mr. Brown at the bar, and said that while Mr. Brown had reached the three score years and ten, and added on a decade and a half, that his eyesight was still undimmed and his hearing unimpaired. He, as did Mr. Thomas, paid a tribute to Mr. Brown's nobleness of character.

Mr. Albert A. Doub said that he could not refrian from saying a word and that he was glad that the members of the bar had taken the action they had while Mr Brown was living, and not wait until he was dead to place the rose of tribute to his memory.

The presentation address was made by Mr. B. A. Richmond, who upon doing so, paid a splendid tribute to the guest of the occasion.

Mr. Richmond said that when he came to the bar here 35 years ago, he found quite an array of legal talent, among whom was Mr. Brown, then considered old, and who was the only living member of the bar of the old members of that time.

Mr. Richmond referred to Mr. Brown's urbanity, saying that he was never heard to make an unkind remark about any member of the bar, and that when the latter learned that Mr. Brown would be 85 years old today, the members deemed it prudent that the event should be celebrated in some public way, and that some testimonial befitting the event should be presented to Mr. Brown, to which every member had contributed, and it was hoped that it would be accepted in the same kindly manner in which it was presented. He then handed to Mr. Brown a purse containing over one hundred dollars in gold.

Mr. Brown was completely overcome by the kind words that had been vouchsafed to him, and was taken greatly by surprise when Mr. Richmond handed him the purse and it was some seconds before he could reply.

Mr. Brown, when he regained his composure, said:

"Gentlemen and friends of the Allegany Bar Association—I did not at all expect or look for such a compliment, and greeting as this. Still it is heartily welcome, and will be gratefully remembered in my last few lingering days. It is true that quite lately I furnished the association with a few facts in regard to myself of a historic character in meaning, yet I do not feel that my legal life, although of unequaled length caused me to be much of a figure or character in the history of the Allegany Bar, which is one of acknowledged ability and character at home and elsewhere. Whatever of note belongs to me arises from my longevity in age, years and membership.

"The living resident members of the Allegany Bar when I came to it in 1849 were: Thomas I. McKaig, admitted in 1831; Samuel M. Semmes, in 1833; Wm. W. McKaig, in 1839; Geo. A. Pearre, in 1839; George A. Thurston, in 1841; John F. Dilley, in 1842; Judge James Smith, in 1835; Wm. H. Holyday, in 1842; William Price, in 1842; J. Philip Roman, in 1843; M Topham Evans (my legal preceptor), in 1843; Charles C. McCulloh, in 1843; Josiah H. Gordon, in 1844; John M. Brewer, 1844; James H. Bevans, in 1844; J. H. C. Mudd, 1846; W. G. Vanlear, in 1846; Charles B. Thruston, in 1847; Thomas Devecmon, in 1848; Geo. B. M. Price, in 1848; Henry W. Hoffman, in 1848; Jacob Brown, in 1849.

"Thus stood our bar when I came to it. I am the sole survivor. The last of the list to go home was W. H. Hoffman, in July, 1895."

Mr. Brown was born near Grantsville, Garrett county, on April 7, 1824, and was admitted to the Allegany County Bar at the April term, 1849, just sixty years ago.

He married Miss Brumbaugh of Washington county in 1851. Mr. Brown's wife died many years ago. He has five children living, two sons and three daughters, and resides at 51 Polk street. He is the last of a family of eleven children.

When Mr. Brown was admitted to the bar the judges were Chief Judge Martin and Associates Judges Marshall and Weisel. Henry Bruce was clerk of the court and John Barnard sheriff.

Mr. Brown is a man whom Cumberland is proud of, and who has lived a long life without making an enemy. He being warmly congratulated today. He is one of the oldest lawyers in the country in active practice. He has also contributed much valuable literature to different publications and is the author of a valuable book containing much local history.

GILLESPIE IS A BANKRUPT.

He Put Up A Strong Fight But Lost at Last.

After a stubborn legal battle in the Federal Court for the Northern District of West Virginia, C. D. Gillespie, who built the Hotel Gassaway, Elkins, has been adjuged a bankrupt by Judge Dayton. Gillespie's liabilities amounting to more than $100,000, with sufficient property, now tied up in his wife's name, to more than offset the liabilities. The case has been referred to M. H. King, referee in bankruptcy.

Gillespie's principal claim to fame in West Virginia was the founding of the town of Brooklyn Heights, opposite the town of Hambleton. About nine years ago Gillespie applied for license to conduct a saloon in Hambleton. His license was refused. Piqued by this refusal, he built a town on a large tract of land on the opposite side of Cheat river and opened a saloon, setting himself up as the absolute "boss" of the place and dictating the law of the town, which he called Brooklyn Heights. In a comparatively short time Brooklyn Heights became noted.

Gillespie invested in Elkins real estate about three years ago and built a six-story hotel. The hotel about 18 months ago went into the hands of a receiver.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, APRIL 29, 1909.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Candidates for nomination on the Republican ticket are invited to announce themselves through this medium. For this service a flat rate of $5 for each announcement, covering the publication in this column until the nominations are made, has been fixed. The cash should accompany the order.

FOR HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the nomination for member of the House of Delegates, subject to the decision of the Republican Convention, and earnestly solicit the support of my friends throughout the county. If nominated and elected I promise my best endeavors for the advancement of the interests of the people of Garrett county. W. W. SAVAGE.

Friendsville, March 30, 1909.

SPLITTING HAIRS.

Hon. Murray Vandiver, who as chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee, is supposed to be its oracle, has spoken. He has declared that there shall be no backsliding by Democrats, that they must work for and vote for the suffrage amendment if they desire to retain their party standing and to share in the party's emoluments. General Vandiver is somewhat inconsistent in his demand for party loyalty. While calling upon all Democrats to support the pet disfranchising scheme of his party, he says many Republicans will vote for it. According to his own conception, therefore, the amendment extends beyond the domain of party politics.

But can General Vandiver and his associates in the management of the Democratic party afford to outlaw those Democrats, who, by refusing to bend the knee, vote against the amendment? Suppose he had issued the same edict four years ago when the Poe disfranchising amendment was defeated by about 33,000 majority? Suppose that edict had been obeyed? Where would the Democratic party have been two years ago, when it elected its candidates for governor, attorney general, comptroller, clerk of the Court of Appeals, and retained its control of the two branches of the General Assembly? What would be the standing of the Democratic party in the coming campaign if this policy of exclusion is to hold good?

Democratic bosses may try to draw nice distinctions between the Poe amendment of 1905 and the Straus amendment of 1909, but the underlying principle is the same, says the Baltimore American. The principle is the disfranchisement of a sufficient number of voters to make Maryland a one-party state. That is the scheme in the background. The pill has not been sufficiently sugar-coated to destroy its bad taste. It cannot be swallowed by the intelligent voters of Maryland.

SWINGING ROUND THE CIRCLE

It is for the public interest that the President should swing round the circle of states. No President of the United States has set foot on Alaska. If President Taft can find time to make personal observation of that still neglected part of the national domain he will perform a public service by making the trip. It is desirable that the President should attend the encampment of the Grand Army, the Trans-Mississippi conference, the National Irrigation Council, the Alaska-Yukon exposition. It is desirable that he should see and be seen by the people in various sections of the country. And the expenses of public service of this nature should be met from the public funds, as provision is made for any other expenditure in the service. There has been a lot of foolishness about the Presidential traveling expenses which is not to the credit of the public or of those who thus appeal to its opinion.

BAD ROADS ARE COSTLY.

To market a crop production worth seven and a half billions of dollars the farmers of the United States paid more than a billion dollars last year. It is estimated by experts that had America the good roads of France that cost could have been kept within 400 millions. Thus the agriculturists of this country pay an annual assessment in excess of 650 million dollars for the price of poor highways. A rather expensive luxury.

Good roads mean a hunderd things besides a saving in the marketing of farm products—increase in valuations, knitting of farm communities, facilities for communication, closer connections with town, with the doctor, the repair shops, the mail and the world in general. When one considers what losses in comfort, in the pleasures of neighborly communion, in instruction and in temper the farmers in certain sections suffer in the course of a year on account of fathomless roads, it is easier to understand why President Roosevelt appointed a commission to examine into the welfare of the most important members of the American social structure.

The Republican for Job Work.

AN UNFAIR LAW.

The ways and means of the trick election laws schemed for the purpose of making Republican votes in this state fewer and Democratic votes more numerous are wonderfully conceived and various. That statutory provision, for instance, which requires a citizen to make a declaration before leaving the state that he intends to return and retain his citizenship seem to have been effective in working the one-sided injustice which it was undoubtedly designed to accomplish. As a result of this ingeniously contrived election juggling statue it seems that many citizens having families, owning homes and paying taxes in this state, but who, because of the nature of their business were compelled to be out of the state at certain periods, have been turned down as voters. Even of those who, before departing, declared their intention to return many have found to their surprise that by some interpretation of the law which fitted their particular cases that they had lost the right to vote.

This specially devised trick election law has resulted in disfranchising several thousand citizens who are taxpayers in Maryland and who have never thought of claiming any other home. The man who goes out of the state for pleasure or recreation escapes disfranchisement. But he who travels across the boundaries and goes to work to earn his daily bread is assumed to have permanently changed his habitation. The scheme was conceived in a spirit of outrageous unfairness, and it is outrageously unfair in its practical results.

SPRING CLEANING.

The arrival of spring and the approach of summer puts in motion the duster and the dustpan, the broom and the swabbing cloth of every good housekeeper. Dirt and dust, which accumulates even in the best kept homes, are cleaned up and swept away. There is a purer, more wholesome atmosphere in the homes after the spring cleaning. The municipal authorities ought to follow the examples of good and worthy housekeepers and give the city a thorough cleaning this spring, removing the dirt, dust and filth which accumulates during the winter in the streets, alleys, highways, byways and gutters. A thorough cleaning in April and May will mean a clean and healthy city during the summer. It will also mean the lessening of the fly and other insect pests. In cleaning the city there should be co-operation between the police and other municipal departments, with the aid and encouragement of all good citizens, including all good housewives. The city cleaning should extend beyond the streets and alleys. It should penetrate the back yards, the drains, in certain sections of the town. In the interests of health and cleanliness, householders should free their back yards and cellars of dirt and dust, tin cans and other accumulations. Indeed, why should not the average back yard be kept as neat and tidy as the front yard? The police can aid in this matter by keeping well informed of the condition of the streets, even before that condition arrives at the odoriferous stage. By co-operation among its municipal authorities and its citizens, Oakland ought to witness a most lively and energetic campaign against dirt and filth. With its hills and copious showers, this is naturally a cleanly city. It becomes dirty only when the householders will not perform their duties and when the civic authorities become indifferent.

TURKEY'S CRISIS.

Strict censorship over Turkish dispatches makes it difficult for the world to reason intelligently concerning conditions in that troubled country. Apparently the nation is on the verge of civil war. Lawlessness on the part of official troops and unofficial mobs is terrorizing communities and enacting horrors worse than those of war. Responsibility for these conditions is not easily fixed. The outcome must also be a matter of speculation in the lack of accurate knowledge of the situation. Opinions may differ whether this revolution marks the failure of the Constitution under the influence of the Young Turk party, or puts the reform party to its severest test, which, to many minds, should have been met at the beginning. In the opinion of many, the deposition of Abdul Hamid is the essential beginning of any effective reform in Turkey. More complete information which may escape the censor is likely to strengthen that opinion as to the need of the present hour.

WHY NOT SUFFRAGE?

Lovely woman has been clamoring for the ballot for many years. In some states this privilege has been given to the sex. They have refuted every argument of the opponents of the movement and have shown that they can act in every respect just as the lords of creation act when they are exercising this right, so sacredly regarded by those who have no interest at stake and so indifferently considered by those who have most to gain or lose through the exercise of the franchise

One of the most recent cases in point presented by women as to why they should have the right to vote is exemplified in the D. A. R. congress which has just adjourned at Washington. They have shown that they can resort to every method known to the most expert ward politician to carry their needs. Charges have been bruited about that even after the ballots were cast the counters changed the result. What more could the expert election officers of some Maryland counties do?

They ostracised each other during the campaign and in this showed an ability to properly grasp the amenities of political campaigns as practiced by the men for many years. There were no election brawls. It would not have been good form to have fought with fists and nails. But the delegates resorted to these peculiarly feminine and exasperating substitutes of cutting each other in public and refusing to attend social functions given by the opposition.

What more is needed to show that lovely woman can act in as reprehensible manner as men ever dared to act in any election? The ability to grasp the finer points of the game having been displayed by the most representative body of women in the country, nothing is left but to give them the right to vote in all elections.

In case they are allowed to vote the state should at once pass a most rigid hat pin law modeled after the lines of the celebrated law enacted at the last session of the legislature to cope with the pistol toting habit.

THE COMPTON FAMILY

Mr. Jacob Brown, of Cumberland, wrote the following communication for this paper on April 15th, a week after the eighty-fifth anniversary of his birth, which was fittingly celebrated by the members of the Allegany County Bar Association on Wednesday, the 7th inst., a full account of the celebration appearing in another column of THE REPUBLICAN to-day. Mr. Brown's remarkable memory, his clearness of vision and the cleverness with which he uses the pen indicates that he is still a remarkably preserved man both in mind and body. That this is true of our highly esteemed correspondent will be patent to all who read the following lines penned by his own hand, being a history of the Compton Family, at one time a family of large connection and of considerable influence in the Grantsville region, but now none remaining there and few elsewhere. Mr. Brown, in discussing this family, says:

To the Editor of The Republican:

It has been quite a while since I have written up any of the good old families of Garrett county. It has been suggested that the Compton family would be a suitable subject for a paper of the kind.

Robert Compton was the ancestor of the family in this region, having been born in 1767 in New Jersey. He claimed that he was a messenger for Washington during the War of the Revolution. By trade he was a tailor. He was married to Lydia Brown in New Jersey and died in Grantsville in the year 1856, and his wife died in Somerset county, Pa., in 1847.

Some years after starting in life Robert moved to Berlin, Somerset county, Pa., where he went into business, following his trade—that of tailoring, where he brought up a family of twelve children, all of whom, except one, are dead. The members of the family became scattered, only three passed away in the nome county—Somerset. The surviving members drifted over into Maryland.

The faithful old family bible record shows the names of the children with the dates and places of their births as follows:

Archie, born in New Jersey in 1802 and was married but had no children; died a number of years age.

Phineas, born in New Jersey in 1804; died July 4, 1858; his wife was Adaline Glotfelty. They had three children—Samuel, Lucretia, wife of Isaiah Boucher, both dead, and Lydia, wife of Dr. H. Stewart.

Eliza Z., born in 1807; she became the wife of Daniel Durst; both dead a number of years ago; left many children, many of them now dead, but some still living. One of of the deceased sons was Elisha, tax collector of old Allegany county.

Sallie A. Compton was born in 1809. She was the wife of Joseph Glotfelty, a prominent citizen of the county. He died in 1864 and she in 1863. Dr. E. H. Glotfelty, of Accident, was a son; once a member of the Maryland Legislature. The oldest daughter, Lydia, was the wife of Perry Shultz, sheriff of Allegany county in 1853; both dead many years ago. Another daughter is Martha, wife of W. H. Swauger, a lumber manufacturer, of Garrett county. She is in her middle sixties; bright and intelligent, and can write matter fit for the type. She had a helping hand in getting up this account of her family.

Catherine was born in 1811; wife of John Davis; both died in Somerset county many years since.

David Compton, the last of the Jersey births, was born July 8, 1814, and died in 1866 from an accident due to the breaking of a threshing machine. He was a blacksmith but later became a prosperous farmer. His wife was Elizabeth Brown, sister of the writer, allow me to say. She died in 1895. The product of this happy union was five sons and one daughter, Armada, who is still living as the Widow Glotfelty in Iowa. The sons were J. L., a physician who died in early life; Ross, for most of his life a prominent citizen of Garrett county, but of late years a resident of Ohio; George, with his family is in the remote state of Washington, comfortably fixed and enjoying a quiet life; lastly, Charles and David, both for many years residents of Webster, South Dakota, where through enterprise and energy they have been very successful and prosperous in general lines of business. One of them is rated at a figure in wealth of over $100,000. They started out young but not penniless. These two young men were not only lucky but wise and judicious in their movements and dealings.

Lydia, born July 21, 1816. About 1835 she became the wife of George Matthews, a well known young man. He was prominent in the two counties and died a number of years ago at a great age; she following a few years ago, very aged. They left no living children.

William Compton was born in 1818 and died in 1823 in Berlin, Pa., the new Compton home.

Robert, born January 25, 1821, in Somerset county, Pa., came to a mysterious death on the night of the Presidential election of 1856 at New Philadelphia, Ohio. His wife was Mary Yeast, who died only a few years ago in her eighties, leaving children.

Charles Compton, born 1823 at Berlin. Went to Grantsville and became a carpenter. From there he went South many years ago; never married; died in Mobile, Alabama, only a few years since.

Henry Compton was born in 1825 at Berlin, but in his early years went to Grantsville where he remained for a long time and then moved to Cumberland, near which city he married Ruth Hardman. His next move was to Grafton, W. Va., where he remains as the last survivor and a memorial of the twelve Compton children. He was once a preacher. He has a wife and a number of children and is a prominent man of his city.

Lastly, Alfred, born in 1828. He died at Salisbury, Pa., while quite a young man; was never married.

The name of this large and worthy family has vanished from our two counties—may say it is extinct—but there is considerable of the Compton blood in the veins of a number of good people in Garrett. In Somerset county, Pa., it still exists in one case, that of Samuel Compton's children. He was a son of Phineas, the gunsmith.

It is almost with sadness when we think of the old-time families which have become extinct in name in our two kindred counties—the work of Providence and of time. J. B.

Cumberland, Md., April 13, 1909.

In Memoriam.

A coincidence in the death of Mr. James H. Jarboe, is the fact that he died on his eighty-second birthday, Thursday, April 15. He was a widely known man and had lived an honorable, upright and christian life. He was born on April 15, 1827, at Harpers Ferry Virginia, (now West Virginia) In 1850 he was united in marriage to Miss Margaret Elizabeth Moreland, of Romney, W. Va., who died in August, 1865, leaving five children, Mr. John H. Jarboe, of De Kalb, Illinois; Mr. Millard F. Jarboe, of Lonaconing; Mrs. Alice Thomson Waugh, of Lewis county, W. Va. (deceased); Mrs. Fannie R. Dawnmiller, of Pittsburg, and Mrs. Amelia S. Thomas, of Wheeling W. Va. In 1866 he was married to Miss Julia A. Snyder, of Newburg, W. Va., who survives him together with the following children: Mrs. Hellice Read, of Clarksburg, W. Va.; Mrs. Veda Crane, and Mrs. Annie Rathbun, of Mt. Lake Park Mrs. Adelia Hedges, of Steubenville, Ohio, and Mr. James G. Jarboe, of Mt. Lake Park.

Deceased was a veteran of the Civil war, having served in Company O, Sixth West Virginia Volunteers. He was honorably discharged on June 10, 1965, and resumed his trade, that of carpenter and cabinet maker, following that accupation until within a year of his death. By his death, through paralysis on Thursday of last week, Mt. Lake Park loses one of its oldest and most highly respected citizens.

The funeral was held on Saturday from the Jarboe residence in Mt. Lake Park, under the auspices of Oakland Post, G. A. R., of which Post deceased was a member. Services were conducted by Rev. Hudson, of the Mt. Lake Baptist Church, and interment was made in Oakland cemetery. All the surviving children were present, with the exception of Mrs. Fannie Dawnmiller, of Pittsburg.

The deceased is also survived by thirty-seven grand children and two great grand children.—Lonaconing Star.

Dissolution of Co-Partnership.

This is to give notice that the co-partnership heretofore existing between E. F. Ringer, W. M. Bishop and D. W. Frazee, under the firm name of Ringer & Co., carrying on a general mercantile business at Kitzmillerville, Garrett county, Md., has been dissolved by mutual consent, Messrs. Bishop and Frazee retiring from the firm. Mr. Ringer will continue the business and assumes all the liabilities of the old firm.

Miss Irene Haulenbeek is expected to be at Deer Park at her summer home next Sunday, to remain until fall. She is very popular with the younger set at Deer Park and equally so in Baltimore city.

Rev. J. B. Workman left Oakland yesterday afternoon for Wheeling, W. Va., where he went to attend a meeting of the Bishops of the M. E. church. He expects to return to Oakland Friday or Saturday.

Mr. William A. Smith, of Hoyes, and Mr. Clarence V. Guard, of Friendsville, drove up to Oakland yesterday where they spent the afternoon on business connected with the Garrett County Telephone Company.

Mr. and Mrs. George E. Bishoff, who were residents for many years of the Hoyes community, have completed the removal of their household effects from their late home to the Casteel farm near Oakland where Mr. Bishoff completed the erection of a modern dwelling house which will be their future home.

Monday the annual inspection of the streets, walks, etc., of Oakland was made by the members of Council who found things generally in fair condition. Some spots, however, they report as unsanitary and an effort will be made on the part of the officials to impress property owners and tenants with the great necessity of maintaining healthful surroundings about their premises.

County Commissioners' Clerk A. G. Ross, who accompanied the Board of Commissioners to Baltimore last week, returned to Oakland on Friday morning. Mr. Ross states that he became acquainted with a number of the clerks of Commissioners from other counties in the state and the exchange of views and opinions in the conduct of the business of the office were of mutual benefit.

Mr. Walter Ravenscroft, of Ridgeway, Pa., arrived in Oakland yesterday morning to remain a few days as the guest of his parents, Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Ravenscroft. The arrival of his younger brother, Mr. William Ravenscroft, of Denver, Col., is expected today who will also be the guest of his parents for a day or two, and then go from here to New York on business.

OAKLAND'S NEW REAL ESTATE MAN

LIEUT. EMORY S. WEST, U. S. A., RETIRED.

NEW REAL ESTATE AGENCY

Lieut. E. S. West Will Open an Office for the Handling of Real Estate.

Lieut. Emory S. West, who was retired from active service in the army last November, and who later came to Oakland and purchased the Lambert property, will open a real estate office in the room recently vacated by F. E. Gonder in the Ravenscroft building, where he will handle both town and country real estate on a commission basis. He will also act as agent in renting property and collecting rents for the owners. Lieut. West, by reason of his service in the army, is in touch with many people of influence and wealth who are more or less interested in summer homes and these he hopes to get into communication with and place before them the great advantage of this remarkable mountain top as a place of residence both for pleasure and profit. He has had experience heretofore in the real estate business and hopes to be able to promote the interests of all classes.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas J. Peddicord left Oakland Monday for a week's visit to Baltimore and points in Howard county, Md., where Mr. Peddicord was born and resided until he came to Garrett county many years ago.

Dr. R. B. Ward left Oakland Monday morning for Columbus, Ohio, where he met in conference with the Bishops of his church and the District Superintendents of Kentucky, Ohio and West Virginia. The meeting between the bishops and ministers will continue throughout the greater part of the week, its object being to plan extensions of the church and improve methods and means of accomplishing greater good.

Prof. Morris K. Turner, formerly principal of the Oakland High Schnol, but who is at present in Harvard University, after visiting the home of Prof. Schuyler Matthews, who will deliver a series of lectures to the Oakland Normal school, says, in a recent letter to Mr. Jos. E. Harned: "There is waiting for you such a treat as you have rarely, if ever, had in Oakland. If you fail to hear him you will miss hearing some of the best lectures ever delivered in this country."

The Rev. George C. Shaw, rector of Holy Cross Episcopal Church and assistant at Emmanuel Church, this city, has accepted a call to become rector of St. George's Episcopal Church, Mt. Savage. He will take charge of the latter parish on May 1st. His Cumberland parishioners are loath to see him go as he is universally beloved throughout both the city parishes, where he has proved a most zealous and earnest worker and a most sympathetic pastor. —Cumberland Times.

A Large Class Confirmed.

On Tuesday morning Archbishop Corrigan, of Baltimore, who arrived in Oakland the evening previous and was the guest of Rev. James E. Connell at the parochial residence, confirmed a class of forty boys and girls as members of St. Peter's Catholic church at a special service held for the purpose. The beautiful edifice was crowded to the doors. The confirmation services were deeply impressive. Many were present from points at some distance from Oakland.

A PACING BULL.

Garrett County Product Will Go On The Track.

Last fall a Durham bull, four years old, broken to harness and also the saddle by a son of Charles Savage, of Deer Park, who had raised the animal from a calf, caught the eve of John H. Ross, of Waynesburg, Pa., a dealer in trotting horses and a turfman of local reputation. Mr. Ross happened to be at Deer Park on business and seeing the possibilities of putting the animal on the track in competition for prizes against horses, he purchased the animal and had it taken to his home where he harnessed it to a sulky and drove out on the race course. Here the bull developed wonderful speed, pacing a mile in 2.30. With this record made Mr. Ross issued a challenge to all owners of horses of the 2.30 class to enter into competition against his bull and the probabilities are that the Western Pennsylvania race courses this fall will witness many novel races between the Garrett county bull and some of the finest horses in Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

The price received by young Savage for his bull was considered a good one until after the above record was made by his new owner when the former owner realized too late the mistake he had made in parting with his property.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. brilliant light overhead flooding her dark hair, and it was not in young human nature to refrain from gazing at her through the invitingly open window. Finally they all pushed back their chairs to retire, and, as she glanced up while rising to her feet, our eyes met fairly, and a warm wave of color swept across the uplifted, sensitive face. The next instant, yielding apparently to some sudden impulse of gratitude, she stepped through the open window, and stood beside me with extended hand.

"Senor," she said, speaking a broken Spanish very prettily, "it was extremely kind of you to assist in removing that horrible man, and I cannot leave without some expression of my gratitude."

I was upon my feet instantly, bowing before her as to a queen, yet feeling a strange embarrassment.

"That incident was nothing, senorita," I insisted, yet venturing to look directly into the depths of those dark gray eyes, so intensely studying my face under the dim light of the lanterns. "I did no more than any man would consider a privilege. I realized you had no younger protector at hand."

She glanced around toward the others of her party, now also upon their feet, and gazing out at us in undisguised amazement.

"No," she explained, as though in unwilling apology; "he has passed the age where he can safely measure strength with rufflanism. It is not lack of courage, senor, but of bodily vigor."

"A time of life which must come to all of us," I returned, hastily, "and prudence is not necessarily disgrace. Yet believe me, senorita, I already feel amply repaid for my little part in this comedy of errors by your smile of recognition and words of thanks. You are English?"

Her eyes fell slightly, the long lashes clearly outlined against the white flesh.

"Yes, senor," she replied, softly, "we are English travelers for pleasure. Our yacht lies anchored in the harbor below."

I imagined she was tempted to inquire who I might be, but, while she stood hesitating, uncertain of the propriety of so personal a question, the spare, stiff figure of the Englishman appeared suddenly in the open casement. For a moment of silence his cold eyes surveyed us both with manifest disapproval.

"Doris," he spoke at last, his words cold and stern, "it would have been proper to permit me to express our natural gratitude to this young gentleman."

She drew aside quietly, making no response, and he stood directly facing me, bowing slightly with a stateliness of manner scarcely courteous, his language immediately changing to Spanish, doubtless assuming that to be my native tongue.

"The gallant action of the senor was greatly appreciated by all of us," he began formally; "the more so because I was so astounded by the fellow's unparalleled impudence as to be, for the moment, helpless to resist insult. I trust the senor has not suffered during the encounter?"

"Not in the slightest."

"That is most gratifying," the calm stateliness of his features slightly relieved by the flicker of a smile, as he drew forth a gold-mounted case and extended toward me an engraved card. "Permit me, senor; and we shall feel greatly honored to receive you at any time on board our yacht in the harbor. The length of our stay at this post is uncertain, yet we shall surely remain for several days. And let me add," he concluded, drawing himself up with an air that compelled my admiration, "that I hold myself personally answerable for any consequences which may follow upon your timely interference. I shall so inform him by a special letter immediately."

I bowed, giving utterance to a word or two of formal thanks, believing I read a far more cordial invitation in the depths of the suddenly uplifted gray eyes behind his shoulder. But he yielded her no further opportunity for expression, and I remained there alone, watching them move slowly across the brightly illumined dining room, instantly the cynosure of all eyes at the numerous tables, my heart pulsing to a new emotion as she turned swiftly, beneath the half-concealing shadow of the portieres, and cast one quick, sweeping glance backward. "Doris"—the name lingered softly pleasant upon my lips in memory, seeming to bring before me the haunting vision of her face. I held the card up to the light and read:

THE EARL OF DARLINGTON.
THE CONSERVATIVE CLUB.

CHAPTER III.

In Which Opportunity Comes.

A period of decided depression followed, the earlier vision of youth fading swiftly as I realized what the message of this card plainly meant, and contemplated the social gulf yawning between myself and this woman of the English aristocracy. A cat may look at a king, and a South American adventurer might venture to gaze admiringly upon this beautiful gentlewoman, yet vaulting ambition should have a care lest it o'erleap itself. Oh, well, it was not much I had to overcome—merely an impression, a fugitive admiration which would early perish, for it was hardly probable we should ever meet again, in spite of his lordship's stiff invitation, and her exceeding warm glance secretly seconding it.

I smiled grimly at thought of so insane a dream of love at such a time and place. Here was I, alone, unable to change my environment, every movement bringing new danger, almost certain of early detection, the result imprisonment or death; yet turning aside to quarrel with one only too glad to denounce me should he discover the truth, and totally forgetting every caution in sudden admiration for a girl never seen before, probably never to be seen again. But a smile can leave a deeper wound than a sword, and my mind would recur, in spite of other intervening thoughts, to the pleasant mystery behind her gracious words and action. I was thus lingering over the nuts and wine, dreaming a fool's dream, and idly wondering at the cause of that endless racket in the streets below, with the chorus of vivas arising from the crowded plaza, when the open window facing my table became suddenly darkened by a burly figure. Before I could push back my chair, the unwelcome intruder on my privacy was politely bowing before me, one hand pressed upon his heart.

"Pardon, senor, my so abrupt appearance"—and I gazed curiously into a round, bronzed face, guarded by closely clipped side-whiskers, and illumined by steady black eyes—"but the waiter said I should certainly find you alone here, and my need was most urgent. I address the Senor West?"

It was the name I had assumed, and, with closely pressed lips, I bowed in silent acknowledgment of my identity, feeling little doubt about the man's mission. The round, rather complacent face broke into a genial smile of relife.

"Must fortunate I am thus to discover you with such facility," he continued fluently, using both hands in gesticulation. "Senor, it is now a great favor I would ask. Could you yield me the honor of a private interview in my own room?" pointing upward impressively. "It is upon the floor above."

"If your mission is in regard to the Sanchez affair, senor," I returned somewhat coldly, "privacy is hardly necessary. The preliminary details can all be arranged here."

He gazed at me in surprise, rubbing his hands together swiftly.

"The Sanchez affiair! I know not as to that, senor. The matter on which I come is most delicate, most secret; it is not for other ears. 'Tis because of what I would communicate that I seek private audience."

I remained motionless, looking straight at him, my teeth clenched on my cigar, my mind busy with expedients. If his call had nothing whatever to do with my quarrel with Sanchez, it must be an arrest. Yet why was the fellow so mysterious? What did he require of me in private audience? Ah! a bribe, probably—he desired to learn first what amount I would give for an opportunity to escape. I arose to my feet, the whole affair settled within my own mind, and cool enough to take advantage of every opening thus presented.

"Very well, senor; lead the way and I will follow."

"Bueno!" He laid one hand upon my shoulder, his eyes darkening with delight. "You have the courage, senor, the audacity of the brave soul. 'Tis in the face, the eye, and gives me hope of my mission already. We will go by the outside stairway, so as to be unobserved by those within."

I followed him silently up the steep iron steps and along the narrow, dimly lighted hall. He paused finally, unlocking a door, and stood politely aside while I entered. A moment he lingered outside, peering suspiciously up and down the deserted hallway, and, stepping within, closed and bolted the door, even carefully lowering the transom before turning up the gas lights. He hastily crossed the room, shut down the single window, and drew closer the heavy shade. I watched these evidences of excessive caution with considerable amusement—undoubtedly bribery of the Valparaiso secret police was considered a most serious affair. A table occupied the center of the room, and with a wave of his rather fat hand my mysterious companion invited me to occupy a chair beside it. The perplexity exhibited by his troubled face caused me to smile again.

"So, senor, to you it was all fun," he said, gravely, gesticulating with vigor. "But I appreciate the danger, the peril of discovery. Everywhere lurk the spies, and what I have to say is not for other ears. Senor, I have addressed you as the Senor West, for so I was bidden; but the man I really seek is not in truth of any such name," his voice sinking to the merest whisper, as he leaned impressively toward me across the table. "It is Senor Estevan."

I crossed my legs in apparently careless indifference, my fingers resting on the butt of the revolver in my pocket, undecided yet whether this was to be war or peace, but prepared for a bold play in either case.

"I am Jack Stephens; so you may proceed, senor."

"Ah! 'Tis as I was told!" his face brightening instantly, his hands delving within an inside pocket of his coat. "This card—see; it is written in the English—it will tell you if I be trusted, if I be all right. You know the handwriting, senor, the man who wrote it?"

I accepted the bit of pasteboard curiously. It was the business card of a well-known sugar firm, and I ran my eyes hastily over the few lines dimly traced on the back: "Bearer is all he represents himself to be; you may do business with him safely.—G. P. L." I glanced upward at the anxious face of the man opposite; he was evidently tingling with excitement.

"You know him, senor? You know the handwriting? You believe him? What is it he says? I read not the English."

"Yes; we are acquainted. He is George Loring, a friend of mine. He says you are what you represent yourself to be, and that I may transact business with you in perfect safety. Now, then, what are you—an agent of the police?"

He shrugged his broad shoulders, spreading his hands deprecatingly.

"No, no; Cielo, no! Does he not tell you my name?"

I shook my head negatively, my interest already deeply increased.

"No! He was most cautious. It was best so; but now I tell you, and you believe." Again he leaned forward, his voice sinking to a mere whisper. "I am Don Emilio de Castillo."

My face must have expressed no familiarity with the name, for he sprang briskly to his feet, shaking a fat, official-looking envelope before my eyes.

"What! you recognize it not? Caramba! then I shall show you, senor. You read Spanish, si? This will tell why I speak with the authority of my nation. See—I am admiral of the Peruvian navy. I have the power, the right, the authority, to say what I now speak to you. You believe that, senor?"

"Yes," I replied, soberly, by now fully awakened to the fact that this was to be no ordinary meeting. "I believe all you say; more, now I remember your name, Don Emilio; but what are you doing here? What is it you desire of me?"

"You know not! You know not what all this means?" he questioned, pointing with trembling finger toward the window. Before I could answer he burst forth vehemently: "It is war, senor; war, disgracefully declared this very day between Chile and my country—the pigs! the cowards! the bullies!" He sprang to his feet as if crazed with sudden excitement, and began pacing the room, waving his hands with wild gesticulations. "They think to fright us, senor, but they will learn a lession. We will fight, senor; fight to the knife. It will not be vivas they will shout—these Chilean dogs—when the Peruvians come to their country. Then they will be begging on their knees for mercy. Sangre de Cristo! but we will show them what war means!"

"Sangre de Cristo! But We Will Show Them What War Means!"

I watched him earnestly, already beginning dimly to perceive in all this a possible opening for my own escape.

"War?" I repeated. "And declared to-day? It has come suddenly, although I am aware there have been months of controversy. Did Peru expect such a result? Is she prepared?"

He paused in his nervous walk, his hands outspread on the table, his dark eyes glowing into mine.

"Both yes and no, senor. We knew well that nothing save war could ever wipe out the Chilean insults to our country. Yet we hoped for more time in which to prepare. Cielo! it is not lack of men—no! no! the army is strong, valiant, senor; it will fight to the death. But the navy! Dios de Dios! we have not the ships, senor. They come not yet, those we have bought in Europe. 'Tis that which has brought me here in disguise to Valparaiso; 'tis that which brings me now to you."

I watched him closely without venturing response, and he sank into a chair, his elbows on the table.

"Si, now I explain it all to you," his voice falling so low I could scarcely follow. "We know for two weeks past war was to come. We have only a few warships, one, two, three; not enough to fight Chile, or even guard our own coast. We have the men sufficient, but not the ships, senor. What could I do? I, the admiral? There was but one hope—the audacity of surprise. They must be taken from the enemy; we must strike the first blow, and at the very heart of the Chilean navy. I come here incognito; I come before war has been declared; I study and observe. To a brave man chances for action come, senor, and so I found what I sought. You know about the Esmeralda, senor?"

I sat up suddenly in my chair, gripping my cigar between my teeth.

"The Esmeralda! You mean that steam yacht the Chilean government purchased from Brazil?"

"Si," his eyes glowing eagerly; "you are a sailor, and so would know of her. She is beautiful, strong, swift, a most dangerous vessel if well handled. Have you ever seen her, senor?"

"Only through field-glasses from the balcony of the hotel. She rode at anchor well off the government mole in the roadstead the last I remember."

He clasped his fingers on my arm, leaning eagerly forward until his face was pressed close to mine.

"She lies there yet, senor, but only for to-night—Dios de Dios! only for to-night! To-morrow they warp her in beside the quay, her crew comes aboard, her armament, her provisions, and she is made ready for sea. Holy mother, such a chance, and only for to-night! Think of it, senor, and wonder no longer if I seemed crazed. She lies out there now in the darkness, swinging to a single anchor chain, her steam up, the nearest battery a quarter of a mile away, and not a half dozen men aboard her. It is as a gift of heaven. Yet, sangre de Cristo! he who should lead the venture lies delirious from fever. Was there ever such cursed luck before!" He gripped his head between his two hands, but I was already upon my feet, my mind instantly grasping the situation.

"Don Emilio," I exclaimed, eagerly, gripping his shoulder, and compelling him to look up, "let me understand this clearly. You had perfected plans to capture and run off this Esmeralda the moment war was formally declared? You have organized a crew for the work, and they are waiting the word here now in Valparaiso? Their leader is suddenly stricken ill, and you have no one capable of taking his place—is that why you have come to me?"

"Si, si, senor."

"How did you learn about me?"

"From Senor Loring. He has lived in Peru. I have known him long."

"But you must have other officers in your party; what of them?"

He spread his hands in a gesture of utter helplessness.

"Senor, I brought with me only the one. It was not safe to bring more. Besides, what need? This Valparaiso is a great seaport; here we may always find the scum of the seven seas; here ever are plenty of men glad enough to fight and plunder—'tis their trade. Cielo! we could enroll 100 devils in an hour along the waterfront, hell-hounds of the ocean, caring nothing for the flag above them if the pay be good."

"True; and you have them ready at hand. Where are they?"

"At the wine shop of Rodrigues beyond the plaza. You know the place?"

I nodded, my memory instantly recalling the foul den.

"How many?"

"Twenty—it is enough for a surprise, and they are sea-rats, senor."

"But they are under officers?"

"Of their own kind, yes, but not of our navy. The first officer is a Yankee whaleman; the second I know not what, only he is a deep-water sailor."

"I see," I acknowledged, taking a long breath, yet continuing to stare at him. "What you need is some one able to command such an outfit, one who can operate a steamship."

Like a flash the official envelope came forth again.

"Si, si, and you can do that, senor I know; I have been told. You hate this Chile; you fight her already in the hills; you hide here now for your life. I come to give you a chance to get away free. But I not stop even with that; no, no, my country not stop with that. See! here I possess the commission, all signed and sealed by my government, of a captain in the Peruvian navy. Only is the name left blank for me to write in. I write in your name; that makes you an officer of the Peruvian navy. See you what it means? Chile dare not touch you except as prisoner of war. Is that not right, senor? But I not stop even with that—no, no! When the Esmeralda comes safely to Peru, the government pays you five thousand American dollars in gold. I pledge you that, I, Emilio de Castillo, admiral."

I walked the floor twice from wall to wall, thinking swiftly, the sodden cigar clinched tightly between my teeth. I could perceive no reason why the deed might not be accomplished if luck favored, and I was sufficiently young so that the danger rather appealed than repelled. Suddenly I wheeled and faced him, still seated at the table.

"You may fill out the blank, senor," I announced, quietly. "I will try a throw of the dice."

NOVELTY ON BREAKFAST TABLE.

Hasty Pudding Recommended by Gastronomic Authority.

The national food magazine, What to Eat, says that hasty pudding, properly made and cooked at a low temperature for five or six hours, or over night in a fireless cooker is one of the most delicious, highly nutritious breakfast foods which can be served; the six generous portions prepared by this recipe served with thin or "berry cream" will not exceed in cost 16 cents; and it contains every element to support life, promote growth and repair waste, at a minimum cost. If milk is substituted for the cream the cost will be still less, with little change in the food value—the fat content only being reduced.

Put one quart of boiling water in top of the double boiler, add one and one-half teaspoonfuls salt, mix two cups yellow or white corn meal with two cups of cold milk, stir this slowly into the boiling water, boil five minutes, stirring constantly, then place vessel over hot water, let cook three hours, stirring occasionally to prevent mush from lumping. The longer it steams the more delicious the flavor; serve with milk or cream.

If white and yellow corn meal is made into hasty pudding in separate vessels, then packed in alternate layers in a brick-shaped mold, then sliced cold and served with cream, it makes a very attractive dish.

The Home.

When blowing out a candle hold it high and blow upward to keep the grease from running about.

Table linen, in order to bring out the bright gloss that makes it attractive, should be dampened considerably before being ironed.

Pieces of old velveteen should be washed and used for polishing. They are an excellent substitute for chamois leather and may be washed as easily as an ordinary duster.

Candle ends melted with an equal quantity of turpentine added make an excellent polish for floors, oilcloths, etc. This polish costs almost nothing and is often considered superior to beeswax and turpentine.

Every housekeeper knows how difficult it is to clean under cabinets and dressers when you have waxed floors and do not want to move the furniture and leave marks from the rollers. By taking out the bottom drawers one can clean the floors perfectly.

To clean painted walls dissolve two ounces of borax in two quarts of water and add one tablespoonful of ammonia. Use half this quantity to each bucket of water; do not use soap. Wash a small amount of the paint at a time and rub dry with a clean cloth.

Checkerboard Cake.

Light Part—One and one-half cups of white sugar, one-half cup of butter, one-half cup of sweet milk, whites of four eggs, one teaspoonful of vanilla, two teaspoonfuls baking powder in two cups of white flour. Dark Part—One cup of brown sugar, one-fourth cup of butter, one-half cup of sweet milk, yolks of four eggs, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder in two cups of white flour, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, one-half teaspoonful of cloves, one-half nutmeg. Mix the dry spices, baking powder and flour together. Now place a spoonful of dark in the center of your jelly pan, then a ring of white, then dark again, so on, till pan is filled. Next pan out a light center, a dark ring, then light again, so on, till the pan is filled, then alternate layers.

Somerset Salad.

Mince as finely as possible a few slices of roast beef or mutton, adding a very little sweet cream, then mixing with a silver fork, stir in gradually half a cupful of cold cooked rice, half a chopped onion, a tiny sprig of shredded mint, and a large cupful of cooked peas; moisten the ingredients from time to time with a good boiled dressing, having the salad of the consistency of whipped cream, and serve decorated with hearts of celery, capers, and chopped hard-boiled eggs. This recipe is capable of a number of variations. Chicken or veal may be substituted for the lamb or mutton, and instead of the boiled dressing a cold mayonnaise may be used.

Dried Peach Butter.

Take a pound or two of dried peaches, wash in a couple of waters, and let stand awhile in cold water to swell. Then drain and add enough hot water to cook. Be sure you cook in a stone jar or crock for a couple of hours; now add sugar to taste, a little dash of nutmeg, take from the fire and beat into a smooth, perfect butter, and then turn back into the jar and allow to cool. Beat up again and you will have as fine a peach butter as you could wish and a cheap spreading for the children's bread.

Apple and Grape Butter.

One basket of Concord grapes, one peck of sour apples. Cut up the apples, cook soft and rub through a sieve. Pinch the pulp from the grapes, cook this and rub through a sieve. Cook the grapes and apples together, add brown sugar, vinegar and spices to taste. Cook until thick like apple butter. This need not be sealed, as it will keep well. It is good with cold meats.

Popular Luncheon Dish.

A luncheon dish very popular in Mexico is made by warming large square salted crackers in the oven and placing on each cracker a large table spoonful or two of baked beans and catsup, heated with butter and highly seasoned.

PAUL AT CYPRUS

Sunday School Lesson for May 2, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 13:1-12. Memory verses, 2, 3.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."—Mark 16:15.

TIME.—Probably in the spring and summer of A. D. 47.

PLACE.—Antioch in Syria, and the island of Cyprus.

RULERS.—Claudius Caesar, emperor of Rome, 41-54. Cuspius Fadus, governor of Judea. The Romans are in Britain, seeking to subjugate the country.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

"The church at Antioch, from which Paul's missionary journey started. Jerusalem had before been the center of influence, its heat and light radiating to Samaria, Joppa, Ethiopia, Cyrene, Damascus, Tarsus, Antioch. The ray that reached Antioch kindled, as it were, a new sun, which became a center of radiation for Asia Minor and Europe.

It was a small and struggling church. Paul and Barnabas were the strongest men in it, the leaders. How could they be spared? Our modern churches and Christians need to learn that it is not keeping, but giving away, that enriches and strengthens.

Missionaries Are Your Representatives.—Those whom you have commissioned, the official heads of the church, have sent the missionaries forth for you. They are your proxies. When you joined the church, you made its enterprises yours, and assumed responsibility for them. You became a partner in a business, the greatest business in the world. If the missions of your denomination fail or grow weak through your neglect, it is as great a disgrace as for you to become bankrupt in any other business to which you have made yourself a partner.

Lessons for Our Work.—1. Paul and Barnabas went first to Cyprus, where they would find a beginning easiest. Wise workers always work along lines of least resistance.

2. They worked in the center of influence, a large city, where they could reach the most people. The church must never neglect the city.

3. They based their work upon the word of God. We shall fail if we do not do the same.

4. They did not try to do their work alone, but utilized John Mark, and doubtless all the other helpers they could find. The most useful workers are those that know how to set others to work.

5. They were ignorant, as yet, that their great work was to be for the Gentiles, but they followed along the line of providence. "A flower will often remain furled for days till a sunbeam touches it, when instantly it will expand."—Baring-Gould. Their mission was preparing for a full unfolding.

V. 8. "Elymas," not necessarily a proper name, being merely Aramaic for magician. He was a Jew; a false prophet, an impostor pretending to a knowledge of the future and teaching untrue doctrines; and he was a "sorcerer," magician or sage, the name given to the wise men from the East, the Magi of Matt. 2: 1, 7, 16. In those days superstition and science were commingled, and the scholar did not consider beneath him the arts of the fortune-teller and the magician.

"There stood before the proconsul the apostle of truth and the emissary of falsehood, like Moses and the magicians before Pharaoh."—Dean Vaughan. Victory over the opposition of the sorcerer was a specimen of all the missionary victories that have been won since, in countless numbers, all over the world. It was won by three means:

1. By the power of the spirit (v. 9). "Saul, (who also is called Paul"—and henceforth, to mark his change of labors, the history drops his Jewish name, Saul, and uses the Gentile name solely) was filled with the Holy Ghost." "The tense of the Greek participle implies a sudden access of spiritual power, showing itself at once in insight into character, righteous indignation, and prevision of the divine chastisement."—Ellicott.

2. By bold speech (v. 10). Paul never minced matters. He spoke out his full heart. Thoughts were made for words, with him! With a stern face, his eyes fixed intently upon the sneering sorcerer (v. 9), he burst out with stern words: "O full of all subtility" (R. V. "guile," deceit) "and all mischief" (the Greek word implies the easy doing of villainy), "thou child of the devil" (though named, alas, Bar-Jesus, child of Jesus!) "thou enemy of all righteousness" (for the Greek word devil, means slanderer, false accuser, and therefore enemy of the truth and right), "wilt thou not cease to pervert," ("distort, turn aside) "the right (straight) ways of the Lord?" It was frankness and truth rebuking craftiness and lies, and doubtless every one within hearing—and perhaps the wretch's own conscience—recognized the justice of the condemnation.

Minds Obedient Unto Christ.

Our minds are dominated constantly by one interest or another; with some, it is material things of different sorts; with others, it is intellectual interests, social interests, physical activities, and so on. But possessed and controlled, the mind is bound to be, by something; and it is for us to choose that something, if we will. Happy is he who chooses and persistently cultivates interests that are inexhaustible in their richness, and that grow better and more interesting as he is the more completely possessed by them.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA

Hunting the Cape Buffalo-Other Game

By Frederick R. Toombs

COPYRIGHT, 1909, BY AMERICAN PRESS ASSOCIATION

AFRICAN hunters are continually impressed by the remarkable, even profligate, variety of game provided for the disposal of their rifles by forest, plain, jungle and waterside. Satiated with pursuit of lions, elephants, rhinos, hippos and panthers, they can at will turn to the chase of the magnificent Cape buffalo that roams from Cape Colony as far north as Abyssinia, or chevrotains (sometimes called mouse deer), or seek various kinds of antelopes, or hunt wild hogs and the bright red wild pigs, the African wild dogs, or kill the cruel awed crocodile or colobi (fur monkeys) or any other animals which the hunter's license allows him to seek, if, like Mr. Roosevelt, he ventures into British East Africa. As for birds of high and low degree there is no end, and for jungle trackers of especially strong nerves the poisonous African snakes hooded adders puffed cobras, ringhals, black cambas eight feet long, pythons over twenty feet long, etc., can be found with less trouble than is absolutely comfortable. These latter are another menace against which the Roosevelt party must exercise pronounced caution.

In the northern and southern reaches of his territory the Cape buffalo (Bos caffer), big of body, strong of leg, curved horned and shaggy eared, is facing rapid extermination, but in British East Africa he is found in large numbers. Largest and fiercest of all African members of his family, the Cape buffalo is blackish in color and characterized by the massiveness of his horns. That he is a foe of the highest mettle and indomitable fearlessness no one who has encountered him in mortal fray will deny.

Sir Robert Harvey, Bart., has traveled three times from his vast English country seat at Langley Park, Slough, to hunt African big game and relates particularly sensational adventures with lions and Cape buffaloes, the latter considered by him as among the most dangerous combatants he has ever confronted.

"If a rhinoceros charges you and misses," declares Sir Robert Harvey, "he will probably continue on madly in the direction he is headed without turning to attack you again, whereas the African buffalo will actually hunt you, and hunt you tirelessly and most persistently."

Sir Robert encountered the largest buffalo he has ever killed in a grassy country, and his first shot (at thirty yards) broke its ribs. The brute immediately charged and received the contents of another barrel. After this the buffalo, mad with pain, chased Sir Robert around and around, getting so close at last that the baronet gave himself up for lost and instinctively clutched at the beast's huge horns. He also smote his enemy on the nose with the butt end of his rifle. The great animal tossed its head, however, and jerked Sir Robert some yards away. His rifle flew out of his hands, leaving him utterly defenseless.

"I crawled away in the long grass," said Sir Robert, "and when I thought I was at a respectful distance I rose up and ran to the camp for another rifle."

In the meantime the buffalo had turned its attention to Sir Robert's gun bearer, whom it gored horribly through the stomach and then trampled savagely underfoot. The unfortunate man was quite dead when his master returned to finish off the dying animal, which already had enough lead in it to settle two or three ordinary buffaloes.

While these buffaloes are usually found in reedy swamps by huntsmen, it is not infrequently that they are met in forests. They habitually travel in herds of from 50 to 200 or 300, those found alone usually proving to be old bulls. When small herds, from eight to fifteen members, are discovered they must be approached very warily indeed, as the lesser groups for some reason are invariably more scary than large bodies. The buffalo's fleetness of foot is shown by the manner in which he frequently outdistances horses on the open plains.

Cape buffaloes sleep during the day, especially when the sun is hot, so early, at sunrise, they travel to a body of water to drink enough to last until evening. They then seek their sleeping places, in summer high, breezy spots, in winter thick, secluded portions of the jungle. At sundown they go for a bath and a drink and graze during the first part of the night, then take a rest and chew the cud.

While the buffaloes have but two enemies, man and the lion, the irritable bulls frequently fight among themselves. Off in some remote thicket two enraged bulls will stand and face each other a few yards apart, swinging their heads threateningly, and then, lowering them, will charge and crash their skulls and horns together with the noise of a lightning bolt splitting wide some great tree. Their horns gash their necks, blood drips from their withers, and, suddenly interlocking horns, one tries to force the other backward. Finally one will begin to weaken, probably the older of the two. He yields, going slowly backward, then with a final effort to conquer or die makes a sudden lunge forward, straining every nerve and muscle. But it is of no use. Spent and weak, he falls to his knees, and the other with a wrench disengages his horns. Stepping backward a few yards, the conqueror makes an irresistible rush forward, turning his head dexterously so that his horn does not strike the loser's head, but instead cuts into his neck, inflicting a deep wound, from which the blood gushes forth in a fatal stream.

For an animal of his bulk the Cape buffalo exercises a degree of cunning usually found in smaller and more versatile animals, and thus it is a particularly hazardous matter to stalk him persistently when he is wounded, for it is then that he exercises his generalship most effectively. For instance, he will seem to flee from the hunter and disappear in a dense thicket. The hunter follows, only to be met and perhaps killed by an unexpected rush from the beast, which on entering the thicket has turned, hidden craftily and awaited the oncoming of his assailant to catch him unawares or in such cramped quarters that he cannot handle his gun with any rapidity or aim with certainty.

Very little is required to arouse the ire of a buffalo cow when with her young, but she can be more readily killed than a bull owing to the comparative thinness of her head bones, but the bull's skull is practically bullet proof, though a lucky shot that hits the narrow crease in the forehead between the horns and above the eyes will kill.

SKINNING AN ELAND.

Crocodiles are found in many of the waters of Uganda, but Mr. Roosevelt will find them in especially large numbers when he reaches the upper courses of the Nile and down which they are found as far as Beni Hassan. The Nile crocodile makes sand banks his favorite haunts, where the current is not too strong to put the lazy monster to hard work in swimming about.

The boldness of crocodiles is proverbial among hunters of them, and they attack men, horses and cattle with deadly vigor. Another characteristic is their remarkable tenacity of life—such, in fact, that there are only two shots that prove instantly fatal to them, one that penetrates the brain and one that severs the spinal cord in the neck. Some sportsmen recommend shoulder shots; but, while these will ultimately cause the reptile's death, it is able to escape into the water, where it immediately sinks. Regarding the brain shot, it should be made by hitting the crocodile behind the aperture of the ear.

The crocodile's boldness is well shown by a story told by a correspondent of the London Times. A man named Williams was fording a branch of the upper Nile on horseback. An enormous crocodile about twenty-five feet in length (the record length is about thirty-three feet) reached upward with its cavernous jaws and dragged Mr. Williams from his horse's back, chewing his leg dreadfully. As the reptile let go its hold the man managed to reach a small island. A companion started to cross to the aid of the victim when the crocodile attacked horse and rider, breaking the horse's neck and cutting the would be rescuer deeply with its sharp pointed, grisly claws.

"The fiendish brute almost stifled me with its horrible breath, and its claws felt like the grip of some misshapen submarine devil who coveted me for his nether place of torment," later said the rider after Williams was got to camp, where he (Williams) soon died. The disturbance roused scores of crocodiles to the surface, and it seemed possible to walk from the island to the mainland on their backs.

Many sportsmen experienced in Africa state that the best mode of killing them is to approach their sunning spots carefully and shoot them while asleep. The creatures sleep with their mouths wide open and in and out of which the black backed plover walks and hops with marked unconcern. Shots at the body of the crocodile should be aimed at as close to a right angle as possible or in such a way that the bullet strikes the hide squarely, for a bullet is easily deflected by the scaly surface otherwise.

Chevrotains are handsome little animals, often said to belong to the musk deer family, but scientists claim that, examined anatomically, they are shown to have no such relationship.

A dainty, shapely, truly graceful little animal, the fine quality of his flesh leads to his undoing by hungry hunters and carnivorous beasts of prey. Weighing from five to seven pounds and about a foot and a half high, Mr. Roosevelt will find him a welcome addition to his African bill of camp fare.

Extremely arduous work is frequently undergone in bringing down antelopes of the African woods and plains. Sure scented, farseeing, fleet footed and inveterate overcomers of natural obstacles that halt native and white men, they coyly prick up their ears when the hunter gets within gunshot and gayly skip out of reach like flirtatious debutantes at a smart cotillion. The eland is the largest of all antelopes, and owing to his indiscriminate slaughter the officials in British East Africa have forbidden the shooting of him.

Captain James Forsyth describes a male panther that, getting a craze for human blood, actually killed a hundred natives, countless cattle, etc. Finally a native, an askari, whose family had lost members through the beast was detailed to go into the jungle and bring back that panther's skin or else never to appear again. After days and nights of dangerous exposure the askari finally located the panther near a pool where animals came to drink. Lying almost all night in the bushes, the askari saw the beast come down to the water's edge and, obtaining a good side shot at him, emptied a muzzle loading shotgun half full of lead slugs and pieces of iron into the brute. After several minutes of indescribable contortions, leaping and twisting the panther lay dead. "When the askari returned with the head of the leopard," said Captain Forsyth, "there were much feasting and dissipation."

In some sections of Africa the panther is held in such terror that he is made a part of the crude machinery of native justice. A native who has committed some offense, stealing, assault, etc., is condemned to go into the jungle and kill a panther. If the native returns with the head and hide of a freshly killed beast he is immediately pardoned.

A theory of various experts on African fauna is that many curious animals exist as yet unseen by white men because these animals only venture forth from their hiding places at night, when hunters and explorers are either asleep or engaged in seeking particular kinds of game. Mr. Roosevelt's plan is to do considerable still hunting at night as a possible means of securing specimens of these unknown beasts and thus becoming a further contributor to the world's store of wild animal knowledge.

As an aid to this end was Mr. Roosevelt's conference in Washington with Sir Harry Johnston, governor of East Africa and a celebrated explorer. Though the discoverer of the unique okapi, Sir Harry could not secure a live specimen. Mr. Roosevelt is confident of obtaining a live okapi, as he will cross the heart of the region where the animal is found in Uganda.

The okapi is the wonderful new beast that looks like a cross between a giraffe, an antelope and a zebra, though such hybridization does not actually occur. Scientists have found the geologic remains of a creature like the okapi in Greece, but supposed it long extinct. Henry M. Stanley heard of it among the central African pygmies, but was content to call it a "donkey." It remained for Sir Harry to explore the almost impenetrable forests of the Uganda, and he succeeded in shooting an okapi, the skin and skeleton of which he sent back to England. It has proved the most important zoological find in recent times. The okapi has a grayish tan skin, longer front legs than hind legs and a small head without horns. Sir Harry also discovered a five horned giraffe, which is taller than the common variety; a singing ostrich, a white whiskered chimpanzee, and new species of the ant bear and the chameleon.

The okapi is striped in part like a zebra, and its flesh is edible, but the similarity to the zebra does not extend to many other parts of the body. It eats herbs, grass and tree twigs and is rarely ever seen, even by the explorers of the innermost depths of the Uganda wildernesses, where human life is held so cheap.

LAWYERS' ADDRESS ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Democrats and Republicans Of Baltimore Issue An Address to Voters of Maryland.

Lawyers of Baltimore City have started an organized effort to defeat the Democratic disfranchisement amendment in the State this fall, and they have held several meetings which have been attended by Democrats as well as Repuolicans in the profession. At a meeting held at the Union League, Baltimore, recently, it was decided to to call the organization the "Lawyers' Anti-amendment League," without any reference to the politics of those desiring to become members of the organization, whose only mission is to concentrate its efforts to defeat the proposed amendment.

The reasons for opposing it were incorporated in an address, which explains in detail all of the objectionable features and discusses these at length. It is probably the strongest docket that could have been framed, a number of the points raised being new, and all of them appealing to the justice and fairness of the voter who has the welfare of the State at heart. One of the strongest arguments is that affecting the foreign-born voter, whom the Democrats are endeavoring to delude into the belief that his and his people's rights are not affected.

The address to the voters, which is entitled "Briefs for the People Against the Straus Suffrage Amendment," begins with the declaration that the amendment is unconstitutional because it does not apply alike to all persons entitled to vote.

The various qualifications which established preferred classes of voters are then described and the unfairness, as well as unconstitutionality of each commented upon. It is set forth that even with the provision for an appeal to the courts the rights of the applicants for registration are not properly protected.

The address then goes on to say:

"Much stress has been laid by those who formulated the proposed measure upon the protection it affords to the right of suffrage of the foreign-born citizens, yet a large class of those who have come from abroad to make this country their permanent home are put in precisely the same class as the negroes. During the last four and a-half years thousands of foreigners have landed at the port of Baltimore and many of them have taken up their abode in this city. None of them can be naturalized before the amendment goes into effect, it it shall pass. All of them are classed with the negro in its provisions. In like fashion are classified all foreigners who shall hereafter come to the United States, unless they be lineal descendants of persons naturalized before the election in November. Unless discrimination against foreign-born persons was intended, it is impossible to account for these restrictions upon the privilege of enfranchisement accorded them.

"The native-born citizens themselves cannot be certain under the provisions of the amendment of an unrestricted right to vote. This right depends as to each person over 61 years of age upon his ability to show that he was entitled to vote on or before January 1, 1869, and as to each person under 61 years upon his ability to show that he had an ancestor who had the right to vote on or before January 1, 1869. The right to vote on that date depended not only upon citizenship, but also upon registration as a voter. The Constitution of the State of Maryland of 1867 provided that only such persons should be entitled to vote as were registered upon a list of qualified voters. It would be extremely difficulty today for any person claiming his right to vote through an ancestor to swear that such ancestor was, as a matter of fact, a registered voter on or before a particular date, even though he may believe that his ancestor was qualified to vote and had the right to register if he saw fit.

In this respect the native-born population is much more at the mercy of the board of registration under the proposed amendment than the foreign-born population, because the question as to whether a foreigner or his ancestor was naturalized between certain dates is a matter of court record that can be readily established, whilst the question as to whether or not a man was registered as a voter more than 40 years ago is a matter that in most cases cannot be proved by any record in existence or any living witness."

Of the alleged purposes of the amendment to elevate the electorate the address says:

"If ignorance and shiftlessness and poverty are not found in company with those qualities which enable a man to vote with benefit to himself and the community, all ignorant, poor and shiftless men should be disfranchised; but this amendment disqualifies the poor illiterate only if he be black, while the white man similarly deficient or unfortunate may freely vote. This discrimination stamps the amendment not only as unconstitutional and unfair, but discloses the insincerity of its advocates, who would take away the right of suffrage from the illiterates of the party of their opponents and at the same time retain it for the illiterate of their own persuasion.

"Moreover, the amendment, so far from elevating the class which it seeks to disfranchise puts the stamp of approval upon that mixture of races which the law of Maryland condemn and most of its people abhor. In order to disfranchise the colored man by the adoption of the grandfather clause, it is provided that all the male descendents of persons entitled to vote on or before January 1, 1869, and all male descendants of foreign-born persons naturalized since that date may hereafter vote without further qualifications. It does not limit this inheritance to lawful descendants and consequently all colored men of mixed blood descended no matter how remotely from such native-born or naturalized white men will be entitled to vote under the proposed amendment. This oversight merely serves to emphasize the mischief bound to follow any attempt to accomplish by devious methods what cannot be lawfully done in a straightforward way.

"We believe that the alleged fear of negro domination has no existence in fact, and that the expressed desire to eliminate the negro vote in order to purify elections and elevate and cleanse the electorate is but a hypocritical pretense under cover of which lurks the genuine motive to fortify and intrench the party in power at the expense of the minority. This result will so inevitably follow the adoption of the amendment that it must have been intended by the authors of the measure.

"The point is next made that the negro question will not be eliminated from politics should the amendment be adopted, as similar amendments in the Southern States has had no such effect.

"Every attempt in the future to displace the Democratic party from power, no matter how good its purposes may be, would be met with the outcry that the success of the Republican party will mean the repeal of the constitutional amendment and the re-enfranchisement of the negro. The negro would be as vital an issue in politics as ever before. The difference would be that the independent element of the community would have lost a vantage ground which it will be impossible to recover."

In conclusion the address sets forth:

"A vote for the consittutional amendment is not only a vote to disfranchise the colored man, but in effect a vote to disfranchise the white Republican, and a vote to deprive the white independent voter of his political strength.

"If Maryland becomes a one-party State, it must take its place with the solid South, and to a large extent lose its influence in National affairs. It will record its vote for the National Democratic party, whatever measures it advocates. If some political heresy, such as free silver, is advanced, the electoral vote of the State will be cast for its adoption if it bears the Democratic label, whatever may be the real opinion of the people."

THE FAMOUS TEMPERANCE ORATOR

Hon. Oliver W. Stewart Will Speak in Terra Alta, Thursday Afternoon, May 6

Hon. Oliver W. Stewart of Chicago, who is considered by many to be the ablest Prohibition orator in the United States, will speak in the M. E. Church, Terra Alta, Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock, May, 6th.

Mr. Stewart is an ex-member of the Illinois Legislature, and is a speaker of commanding ability. His work in that state last winter did more to create sentiment in favor of constitutional prohibition, than that of any other man. He has so far delivered not less than 175 addresses in West Virginia.

A rare treat is in store for people of Terra Alta and vicinity. A delegation is expected from Mt. Lake Park at which place Mr. Stewart has often spoken to the great delight of his hearers.

Women as well as men, are invited to hear Mr. Stewart. Admission will be free.

Tells About Deer Park.

Manager Burwell of the B. & O.'s widely known hostelry at Deer Park in the glades of the Alleganies, is in the forefront of resort contemporaries in indicating the rapidly approaching season of rest and recuperation through timely publication of where such is to be assured. It's form is an exceptionally attractive little book new throughout both as to matter and illustrations. As a specimen of the art typographical it is well worth the pocket space into which it fits for carrying home where the style followed in telling of the comforts, delights and advantages of recreation in the mountains is sure to afford more than a passing interest within the family circle.

Orphans' Court Proceedings.

Orphans' Court was in session Tuesday morning with Judges G. Semmes Hamill, Henry Kamp and Thomas Moon on the bench and Register Friend in attendance, when the following business was transacted:

Enoch E. Kesner was appointed administrator of the personal estate of Charles W. Moore, late of Garrett county, deceased.

A copy of the will of the late John C. Crane of near Terra Alta, was filed and a petition presented praying for the appointment of Cloyd C. Crane as administrator with the will annexed.

A petition was also filed asking for the appointment of an administrator of the estate of the late James Broadwater said administrator to perform specific acts set forth in the petition.

Nearly Killed by Big Bowlder.

One of the biggest slides in recent years occurred on the seventeen-mile grade, east of Everett's tunnel, on the B. & O., Thursday. The mass of earth and stone pushed the north track clear over the bank.

While a large gang of men were cleaning up the slide, a large bowlder on the hill above became loosened rolled down with incrasing velocity, and striking another large rock, burst in several pieces. One huge piece of rock struck an Italian laborer named John Antonicci, with such force as to knock him several feet. The poor fellow suffered fearfully from his injury, and he was hurried to Hoffman Hospital, at Keyser, for treatment, and it is thought that his injuries may prove fatal. Following out a custom of the foreign workmen, the entire gang of fellow Italians quit work for the rest of the day, and the work of removing the debris was seriously handicapped.

ASA MOON.

Deer Park, R. F. D., No. 2. 8-3*

BLOOMINGTON.

Mrs. Emily Hays Bush, wife of Mr. Frank Bush, of Rowan, a small saw mill town on the W. M. R. R., two miles west of the W. Va. Junction, died suddenly of apoplexy on Thursday morning at eleven o'clock. Mrs. Bush had been housecleaning and was in the act of hanging a piece of carpet on a line in the back yard, when she complained of feeling giddy. Her daughter took her into the house and put her to bed, where in a few minutes she became unconscious, rapidly grew worse and died in a few hours. She was 51 years old and leaves six children, three sons and three daughters, the eldest of whom, Mrs. Brown, is the wife of the head of the Brown Lumber Co., operating the plant at Rowan. Her remains were taken to Stoddardsville, Pa., the permanent home of the family, on Friday for burial.

The typhoid fever situation at Bond has improved wonderfully in the last ten days. The last one of the ten cases sent to the Western Maryland Hospital for treatment a month ago, returned this week and the town can now be said to be free from the disease. The company is sparing no effort or expense to prevent a further outbreak of the trouble; the use of water from poluted wells is strictly prohibited and every suspicious hole and corner either limed or fumigated.

Dr. and Mrs. Richard Gerstell, of Grafton, are visiting relatives at Barnum.

Mr. Wm. Moody, the oldest merchant in town, was a visitor to Oakland on Monday.

Mr. John Raley left for East Liverpool on last Monday morning to line up with the baseball team of that place at the opening of the season of the O. & P. League. His brother, Mr. Ross Raley, of Blaine, who signed a contract with the Charleroi team, left the same day to take part in the opening game at Charleroi.

Mr. Malcolm Macfarlane, who has been visiting his brother at Barnum, left for Audenreid, Pa., this week, to accept a position with the Dodson Coal Co. His work will be in line of his profession, that of civil engineer, and will deal with the rebuilding of the Morea breakers, which were recently destroyed by fire.

A landslide on the W. M. R. R., yesterday one mile west of Hampshire, tied up the road completely for about three hours. No. 2 the vestibule limited, pulled into the Junction three hours behind schedule time.

BITTINGER.

Rain, snow, sunshine and freezing weather marked the weather conditions in this section last week and this week begins with rather cool conditions and sufficient moisture on the surface of the earth to delay the farmers in their spring preparations.

Rev. Alvin Yugel spent part of last week in Oakland, Cumberland and Frostburg purchasing materials and making preparations to begin the erection of a new Lutheran church at Jennings, this county.

W. A. Althers is at work painting the exterior of the Lutheran parsonage in this village.

Messrs. J. J. Bender, of Grantsville, and Mr. Lichliter, of Salisbury, Pa., were in this section last week buying up maple sugar.

Truman Bittinger, of Negro Mountain, was a caller in this village last Monday morning.

Mr. and Mrs. Elias Orendorf spent last Sunday with their daughter, Mrs. Christian Schrock.

An infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Adam Snyder was buried in the village cemetery last Friday afternoon.

While a party of young people were searching for early spring flowers, near the summit of Meadow Mountain, last Sunday afternoon, they came upon a colony of rattle snakes. Two of the reptiles were quickly dispatched by one of the young gentlemen and the remaining three snakes escaped to the rocks amid the screams of the terrified young ladies.

SWANTON.

Do not, Mr. Editor, permit such a sudden shock of surprise as to produce a faint at a whisper of the fact that Swanton, gay Swanton, is very calm, very! But her somber colors are gone and this morning her dress is trippingly bright and fresh, with her valleys and her highlands suggestive of spring and buds, plants and flowers.

Up to date, fruit generally has shown decided prudence by keeping within safe fortifications while winter wages its closing battles over fields of departed snows.

Farmers are already crowding to the front in their vernal lamentations as to all agricultural pursuits and expectations more backward this year than ever before in the memory of man or the record of events. Notwithstanding these deploring declarations, much plowing has been done, oats seeded and many gardens freshened for the season.

Postmaster Sweet continues too complaining to resume his customary place in business duties or in the many other activities in which he was prominent for community betterment.

Either fluctuating weather or sudden visits of winter flurries, may be chargable as a cause for no little sickness, some of it of a grave aspect, close about us. In quite a limited radius today there are not less than seven cases of acute pneumonia, and no resident physician to administer pill or potion—strange that so wide a field does not attract some good doctor well established in the profession. This prevalence of pneumonia is by no means indicative of a sickness breeding locality, convincing proofs to the contrary are at hand. One of the mentioned pneumonia patients, a man sixty-six years of age, lived here all his life, told me yesterday that he had the day before taken his first dose of medicine either administered or prescribed by a physician. Now, look over the entire scope of our mouniain salubrity and point out a "rising thimble" to equal this—Oakland, Mountain Lake and Deer Park will drop their heads and say nothing. RELLIM.

NOTICE TO TAXPAYERS!

This is to notify the tax payers of Garrett county that the Annual Levy for 1909 has been made and published, and to call their attention to the following abstract. Section 43, Chapter 366, Acts of 1890, relating to the discount to be allowed and the interest to be charged on all tax bills.

"All county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of the levy thereof, and on all county taxes paid on or before the 1st day of September a discount of 3 per cent. will be allowed, and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. The Treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the tax bills for county purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt given for taxes so paid. But the discount shall not be allowed unless the whole amount of state and county are paid when same is made.

W. E. HOLLINGER, Treasurer.

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, MAY 6, 1909. NUMBER 10

THE FUTURE PROSPECTS OF OAKLAND AND VICINITY

What the Washington Herald Contained in Special Southern Edition.

Last Sunday's issue of the Washington Herald was a special edition devoted to the South, its development and the future of that portion of the United States. Concerning Oakland and Garrett county was an article prepared by Mr. Samuel Lawton, secretary of the Oakland Board of Trade, which is reproduced, as follows:

"Owing to the stringency in the money market for the last year the progress of improvement in this section has been rather slow.

"During the last year we have erected a new court house at a cost of about $80,000, which is said to be the finest court house in the State outside of Baltimore city.

"The prospects for the coming year are very bright. Our town has recently paved a number of the principal streets and during the next few months will install a complete system of water works and sewerage, at a cost of about $60,000. The water will be obtained from artesian wells and is absolutely pure.

"Contracts have been signed and franchises granted by which we expect the West Virginia & Maryland Gas Co. to pipe natural gas into Oakland within the next few months. With cheap gas as fuel and with an unlimited supply of high grade glass sand (98 per cent. silica) at our door, we expect to induce a number of glass manufacturers to locate with us in the near future. We have also vast deposits of coal, fire-clay, kaolin, limestone, iron ore, and glass sand within a few miles of Oakland, which is practically undeveloped, but which is destined to make this section the richest in the State within the next few years.

"In the way of farm lands we can offer the best land in the United States for the least money. Crops have never been known to be an entire failure in this section, and an average yield of from twenty-eight to thirty bushels of wheat per acre is a common occurrence. The principal crops are wheat, oats, rye, buckwheat and corn. The land and climate are especially adapted to apples and plums and all varieties of small fruits, which, coming into the market after the eastern fruits are gone, command a ready sale at the very best prices.

"Garrett county, of which Oakland is the county seat, is destined to become the richest county in the State, owing to its immense deposits of minerals and its fine farming lands."

MEETING OF BOARD OF TRADE.

Election of Board of Directors Occurred Tueseay Night.

Tuesday evening in the Council Chamber, which has been placed at the disposal of the Oakland Board of Trade by the Mayor and Council, the annual meeting of the Board for the purpose of electing officers for the ensuing year was held and was well attended by members of the organization.

The meeting was presided over by Mr. G. Semmes Hamill, the retiring president, who addressed the members, stating the purpose of the meeting and intimated that he would no longer accept the position of president of the body.

Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill also addressed the meeting and laid before the members a plan for the development of this portion of Garrett county which, if carried into effect, will bring excellent results and add to the wealth and convenience of all residents and property owners not only in Oakland but the whole country surrounding it.

The election of a Board of Directors by ballot was called for resulting in the selection of the following: D. M. Dixon, H. C. Sincell, Austin Brown, D. E. Offutt, Jr., D. M. Moson, B. H. Sincell, E. W. Helbig, J. D. Hamill, J. E. Harned and R. E. Sliger.

The directors will meet on Tuesday evening next for the purpose of chosing the president and other officers of the Board.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY WORK

Average Cost of Roads More Than $3,000, It is Said

The Maryland Geological Survey Monday discussed suggestions concerning the cost of the new state roads.

It was said that while in Maryland and in other States good roads have been built for $3,000 a mile and even less, the average cost in this state and in all States by far exceeds that amount.

Statistics showing the cost of roads in other States were examined, and, it was stated that their average is about the same as in Maryland.

A report was submitted by the highways division showing that the survey will spend about $250,000 this year under the State Aid act in constructing roads. This means that the State will spend $125,000 and the counties the same. That is about the same amount that was expended by the survey last summer.

Dr. William Bullock Clark's report contained a number of surveys showing the iron ore and limestone deposits in the State. He also explained the plans of the survey. The recent survey of the Mason and Dixon's Line was shown

Mr. and Mrs. John Davis and family, of Oakland, were here Sunday visiting Mrs. Davis' parents, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Wilburn.—Preston Republican.

NEW MEMBER GARRETT COUNTY SCHOOL BOARD

Mr. Chauncey E. Ellithorp Has been Appointed to Succeed Mr. Wm. Miller.

On last Thursday while in Baltimore at a meeting of the State Democratic Committee, Mr. William Miller, of Accident, tendered his resignation to Governor Crothers as a member of the Garrett County School Board, much to the surprise of nearly every resident of the county as no intimation had been given out that such a step had been contemplated by Mr. Miller.

A report was current several weeks ago that some friction had developed between the members of the Board, but this report could not be confirmed and it was presumed that it was without foundation.

When Mr. Miller resigned he requested the appointment of Mr. Chauncey E. Ellithorp, of Bittinger, to succeed him, and this request on Mr. Miller's part had weight with the Governor and Mr. Ellithorp was accordingly appointed but has not yet qualified. Mr. Ellithorp was a member of the Board until the beginning of Governor Crothers' administration when the present executive appointed Mr. Miller.

ASHER GLADE.

If the old saying be true that the last Friday of each month rules at least half of the next month, we can surely expect that part of May will be very wet.

Mr. Charles C. Fike, our mail carrier, was in this section one day last week on business.

Mrs. Harriett Umbel, who has been very ill, is on the mend at this time.

All those who have been receiving mail at Fike, are now served by the rural mail route from Selbysport, the Fike post office having been discontinued.

Mr. Clarence Miller, who has been suffering with an attack of pneumonia fever, is now on the mend.

Wm. H. Thomas made a business trip to Markleysburg, Pa., one day last week.

Mr. George F. Wass was seen passing through this section last week driving some young cattle to pasture.

Mr. Lincoln was around leasing more coal land.

BRIDGE ON NATIONAL ROAD WRECKED BY VANDALS

A Portion of the Structure Spanning Savage River Wantonly Demolished.

A report has reached Oakland of the wanton demolition of a portion of the stone arch bridge spanning Savage River on the old National Road between Johnson's and Frostburg, the vandals guilty of the crime hiding their identity up to the present time but an effort will be made to bring them to justice by an outraged public.

The portion of the bridge destroyed includes about six feet of the northern exposure of the arch and takes in the keystone at the top, the implements used in the work of the vandals being pike poles and other materials which naturally drift with streams running through a lumbering region.

The bridge was erected many years ago, about the year 1825 or a little later and its dimensions are from the water to the top of the arch 18 feet.

The Board of County Commissioners will meet on Tuesday and that body will be called upon to take some action looking to the arrest and conviction of the parties guilty of the outrage.

FALSE ENTRIES CAUSE DOWNFALL

F. B. Wood, Clarksburg Bank Cashier, Confesses to Shortage of $20,000.

On the verge of a nervous collapse, Fred B. Wood, cashier of the West Virginia Bank, a state institution at Clarksburg, is in jail at Clarksburg, charged with falsifying the books and being short in his accounts.

The specific incident on which the warrant for his arrest was issued Monday was an alleged false entry upon the general ledger of the bank, showing a deposit by the bank in the Mellon National Bank, of Pittsburg, of $5,000, as an asset of the West Virginia Bank, which; the officers of the bank assert, is false, and was made by him for the purpose of defrauding the bank and converting the money to his own use.

Officers of the bank say that the defalcation of Wood is a trifle more than $20,000. They also say that Wood has confessed to a shortage of $20,000 and to making false entries to conceal his transactions from the board of directors. His explanation is that he loaned money to friends on paper that afterward proved to be worthless. The bank authorizes the statement that Wood has not accounted satisfactorily that all the money went that way.

Wood declares that he did not gamble nor speculate in stocks, nor use any of the money for his own benefit.

The bank officials demanded a bond of $25,000, which as yet Wood has not been able to furnish. While the bank has not a large capitalization, some of the wealthiest men of the state are behind it, and it is solvent. Mr. G. L. Duncan is its president, and the stock is held by R. T. Lowndes, the Lowndes estate, Dr. W. D. Goff and other wealthy residents. The solvency of the bank will be in no wise effected by the Wood embezzlement.

Wood is a young married man and has three children, one of whom is only two days old.

One of the attendants at the county jail says that Wood has lost his reason. He is raving like a maniac and his condition is deplorable. It is feared that the affair will kill him before many hours.

Two brothers who arrived in Clarksburg from Wheeling, say that every loss will be made good. It is not believed that Wood will be prosecuted.

Prize Corn Sent Garrett County Farmers.

Senator W. McCulloh Brown was in Oakland Tuesday and distributed from this point some specimens of Leaming corn to farmers in a number of the Districts of the county, the corn being accompanied by a request from Senator Brown to those receiving it to plant and make a report. This corn is from the same lot which took first prize at the cereal exhibit in Baltimore last fall and is exceptionally valuable to the farmers of this county as it matures early in the season.

RIGHTS OF WAY BEING SECURED FOR GAS LINE

By Representatives of the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Company.

Representatives of the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Company started Monday morning to secure rights of way for the gas line from Gorman to Oakland, on the route determined upon by General Manager Northrup after several lines had been run by the Company's engineer.

Whether any opposition on the part of property owners has been met by the right of way men has not been given out, but it is thought that the land owners will grant all reasonable requests of the gas company and that work on the construction of the line will not be delayed on this account.

The people of Oakland and other towns to be served by the gas company have lent every assistance toward having the gas brought here and now that it is almost an accomplished fact all feel it is due the communities to be served that everyone through whose lands the gas line is to pass should render every possible and reasonable aid.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. SIMON BAKER.

Mrs. Simon Baker, aged 37 years, died at her home near Grantsville Saturday afternoon. She is survived by her husband. The funeral took place Monday afternoon with interment at Johnson's, about four miles west of Frostburg.

WILLIAM W. SWEET.

Mr. William W. Sweet, postmaster and merchant of Swanton, Garrett county, died at his home in that place Tuesday at midnight, aged fifty-four years, leaving surviving him his wife and two children. Mr. Sweet's illness dated several months back, he having been a sufferer from bright's disease. His funeral will occur from the M. E. church in Swanton Friday afternoon of this week. A more extended notice of Mr. Sweet's life and death will appear in a later issue of this paper.

J. INSKIP KELLER.

Mr. J. Inskip Keller, of Romney, well known to many Garrett countians, a brother of Mrs. Edward E. Sollars, died very suddenly yesterday afternoon as a result of heart failure. There had been a railroad wreck near Mr. Keller's home in which several residents of Romney were more or less injured, and in the excitement resultant therefrom Mr. Keller was attacked with the disease which brought about his death. He was fifty-seven years of age and is survived by his wife and two children and his aged mother.

To pay this amount it was ascertained that the taxable property as shown by the assessment books amounts to $8,491,012, which at $1.02 on the $100, will make the above amount for county purposes; $86,608.32.

Deducting $728,314 for Corporations paying direct to the State Treasurer, leaves the basis $7,762,698 at 16 cents on each $100, makes $12,420.32, and this added make the taxes for state and county purposes $99,028.64.

COST OF KEEPING A COW.

The Results Obtained by One Man Who Kept a Record.

The expense of keeping a cow is the cost of labor and feed. As a rule the labor is not included, but I think that is the most serious question, declares C. O. Carlson, in Dairy Record. When we hire help to milk and care for the cow, we pay good wages, and even at that, it is hard to secure a man that will do the work satisfactorily. It costs to do the milking, whether the hired man or anyone else does it, as a cow that gives milk during ten months out of a year must be milked 600 times. This will take about ten minutes each time, or a total of 100 hours.

The stable must be cleaned during the stabling season and that season should be about eight months. This will take about four minutes a day, or 16 hours a year. Feeding the cow hay, silage and grain will take about seven minutes a day, or 26 hours a year. To water the cow will take about five hours a year. Separating and caring for the cream, 14 hours; hauling cream to creamery, five hours. This will make a total of 166 hours per year.

Now what does that labor cost us when we hire a man? If we want a good one we must pay him $25 or $30 a month, together with board, lodging and washing. It will amount to about 15 cents an hour, and 166 hours at this price per hour would be $24.90. But when there is help enough in the family to do the most of this work, one does not consider their time worth as much. Of course, these figures may vary in some instances, as in some places it is much more convenient and it may not take as much time to care for the cow, but I consider that it costs about $25 to keep a cow, and this covers the roughage, etc. Farmers that have no silage will necessarily have to feed corn fodder, and of this, together with the hay, a cow will need four tons during the winter. Hay at four dollars a ton and silage at two dollars a ton. The roughage will amount to $14, including pasturage. The grain at last year's price will amount to about $21. If a good cow is given good care, together with the above feed, she will produce about 6,000 pounds of milk and 240 pounds of fat. Figure this at 25 cents and it will be $60 for the fat; 5,000 pounds of skim milk at 20 cents will be $10. Total income, $70; labor, $25; feed, $35; net profit, $10.

Now figuring on the profits from a cow that is cheaply kept—$15 worth of feed, and the cost will still be $20 and the labor $25, which will bring a total of $45. The best she could possibly do would be 3,500 pounds of milk, 140 pounds of fat, which would bring a total of $41, or a net loss of four dollars directly and more indirectly. Why do we have so many unsatisfied dairymen? I do not think there is any profit for a man who does not give his cows good care as she figures upon it.

Be True to Thyself.

How much time he gains who does not look to see what his neighbor says or does or thinks, but only at what he does himself, to make it just and holy.—Marcus Aurelius.

FIGHTING RUM.

It Is No Dress Parade—Every One Can Help.

There is a fascination about reform work which attracts earnest souls who want to do some great thing to overthrow the saloon. Whenever I talk with people of that kind, writes Rev. Albert Sidney Gregg, in Christian Work, I always show them the seamy side of the undertaking. Fighting rum or any other evil is not all dress parade, or mass meetings or big crowds. There is much to dishearten, aside from the intrenchments of the enemy. So when we engage in this warfare we must know ourselves, count the cost, and then go ahead. The foolhardy man rushes in without counting the cost while the really brave man looks danger in the face and then makes the attack.

The name of Ethan Allen, commander of the Green mountain boys, is inseparably associated with that of old fort, Ticonderoga. On May 10, 1776, he captured the fort with a little band of 83 men, and then captured Crown Point, gaining a large supply of cannons and ammunition which were afterward used by the continental army. Just as Allen and his men were about to make the attack, Allen addressed them thus:

"Friends and Fellow Soldiers: You have for a number of years been a scourge and a terror to arbitrary power. Your valor has been famed abroad and acknowledged, as appears by the advice and orders to me from the general assembly of Connecticut to surprise and take the garrison now before us. I now propose to advance before you and in person conduct you through the wicket gate, for we must this morning either quit our pretensions to valor or possess ourselves of this fortress in a few minutes. And inasmuch as it is a desperate attempt, which none but the bravest of men dare undertake, I do not urge it on any one contrary to his will. You that will undertake, voluntarily, poise your firelocks."

It is almost needless to say that every firelock was instantly poised. His speech was the kind that would turn a coward into a hero. We need more of that quality in our speaking on temperance questions—the quality that will stir the indifferent to action.

The great batteries of the temperance army are the pulpit, the platform and the press. Then we have companies of sharp-shooters who write letters. Every man has some weapon that he can use if he will look around and he can use that weapon better than anybody else. David used a sling; Gideon planned a clever stratagem and Carrie Nation swung a hatchet.

I have heard of women who could turn a hatpin into a deadly weapon. One man or woman going about a community talking a person up or down will do a great deal of good or a great deal of harm in the course of a year. Very few of us realize the extent of our influence. We hesitate to act because we are not always to trace out the effects. In the very nature of the case it is impossible—physically impossible—to trace out the effects of our acts. But rest assured as sure as we say or do anything in the interest of a better social order, results will be sure to follow. If we could convince the friends of reforms that it was worth while to send letters and petitions to the legislature or congress touching reform legislation, it would be possible to get a larger number of reform bills passed. Letters and petitions are the most powerful weapons we can use next to the ballot-box.

THE TRANSFORMATION.

Story of an Old Scotchman Who Gave Up Drink.

"Freens, 15 years syne I was a pir sodden drnkard in the clutches of Satan. An' whit did he dae for me? He put me in a madhouse and telt me there was nae hope for me," the War Cry reports an old Scot as testifying.

"'Aye,' he said, 'Andra, gang an' lay yer heid on the rails when the train's comin', an' it will be all richt with ye, just like yer ain brither.'

"I hadna' a decent rag tae ma back. Noo I'm clad like a gentleman in guid claith (he always wears a full uniform), a guid shirt tae ma back, and anither yin tae cheenge wi' at hame.

"Fifteen years syne ther wasna' a decent stick in the hoose; noo I've a guid hame and three beds in it.

"Mony a day there wisna' as muckle as wad feed a moose; this morning ma lassie says: 'Faither, will ye ha'e ham an' eggs for breakfast?' Glory! that's what the Lord has done for Andra. He has pitten my feet on the rock Christ Jesus, and made a new creature of me, and brocht me tae ma sens, and what the Lord has done for Andra, he can dae for ye."

A Work Against the Saloons.

The army branch of the Y. M. C. A. of New York is closing an excellent year of work. Its work is located at the very heart of Forts Wadsworth, Wood, Jay, Schuyler and Slocum. Not only by introducing entertainments, games, athletics, social and educational clubs and classes, Bible classes and meetings, but especially by the presence and friendship of the secretaries who live with the men, they are drawn back to worthy and high ideals.

FROM FORT SUMPTER TO APPOMATTOX

Lessons of the Great Civil War Will Never be Forgotten.

It was on an April day in the year of 1861, that the first shot was fired in Charleston harbor against Fort Sumpter and the American Flag. It was the first shot of the great Rebellion that followed, which reverberated around the world, which finally culminated after four long years of fratricidal war in which tens of thousands of patriotic American fathers and sons gave up their lives in defence of their beloved country and the Star Spangled Banner, which they followed. Rivers of blood ran thick throughout this vast and beautiful land of ours to save it for the land of the free and home of the brave.

After four years of terrible war and strife, the last faint echo of the Charleston shot at Fort Sumpter died away on an April day in 1865, at Appomattox under an apple tree, now famous in history, for at Appomattox this nation was born anew from a slave country to a free country throughout her vast domains. The American people can now truthfully say we have a free country, prosperous, happy and reunited, and,

"Then asked what state he hails from,
Our sole reply shall be,
He comes from Appomattox
And its famous apple tree."

Mike O. Rielly these lines made famous by the imperious Roscoe Conklin in his speech nominating Grant for third term, have a wider meaning, now a broader range and application.

Appomattox no longer means a Virginia cross roads, but a mark on the line of march of nations, nor does it merely indicate the closing incident of a four year fratricidal war, but rather the beginning of a new era in the history of this country, and incidentally great changes in political conditions throughout the world. Appomattox brought the United States into the limelight so clearly that the world powers saw and realized they had a new element to reckon with. A world awakener in the following lines:

By the river bridge that arched the flood
Their flag to April breeze unfurled,
There once the embattled farmers stood
And fired the shot heard around the world.

It was an April day that the patriots stood at Concord bridge and fired mortal defiance to tyrants, thereby declaring for freedom and indepencence — Emerson. The world heard the shot but did not tremble nor did they fear any disturbance of world power. It was on an April day (as recited above) that a shot was fired from a battery in Charleston harbor that was heard around the world that aroused more or less apprehension in the minds of the ruling powers. In most countries, especially Great Britian or the British Government, it meant the destruction of our government and the establishment of slavery, while in most others it meant the destruction of Republican form of government, but as the United States was not then rated as a world power, and only allowed through courtesy to take part in world affairs, there was little danger of seriously disturbing the equilibrim of the political world. A keynote was sounded a long time ago when Patrick Henry exclaimed, "I am not a Virginian, but an American in the Continental Congress." He then thought he was speaking for himself alone, but instead he spoke for the million that followed him, and for the untold millions yet to come.

That note of peace that rang out from Appomattox on an April day two score and four years ago was heard the world over, and is still ringing in the ears of all the ruling powers and has caused more consternation among those interested in world affairs than had any of the shots announcing the commencement of this fratricidal war. The result was disappointing to the dominating powers generally and served rather to complicate the problems than to solve it.

John Bright, England's foremost political economist, and standing high in the estimation of the powers, had predicted the failure of this government to restore the union and who had often urged his government to acknowledge the South by granting beleagers rights, he was sorely disappointed. Coming with his disappointment came an awakening to the fact expressed by Patrick Henry, that the people are not merely statesmen but Americans, and a world power to reckon with. In an addressed delivered after the official announcement of the close of the war, John Bright acknowledged his disappointment, but said a more difficult task had been forced on the national government than that of fighing down the South, to-wit: The establishment of a union of all the states, but if it succeeds in this it will not be 40 years until there can be no great International War, nor material changes of the political map of the world without first consulting the United States of America.

Forty years had not elapsed until this government had been counseled in international affairs, had solved the vexatious Spanish problem, and had practically dictated the terms of settlement between Japan and Russia. John Bright had prophesied better than the world thought, or than he had realized. But from the April day on which the swelling notes of peace rang out from Appomattox, the United States of America has steadily grown in magnitude in the eves of the world until now it ranks equal to the best and its star is still in the ascendent, and the bright and shining light of all the nations. Peace hath her victories no less renouned than war wrote Milton to Cornwell. From Appomattox day to this hour peace has had victories that have astonished the wise ones who can recall the anti-bellum days clearly enough to compare them with the present. Personal enmity has dwindled almost to a cipher politi- differences have lost much of their sectionality, plantations have been divided into farms; school houses like beacon lights are guiding the people out of ignorance into the broad light of the present day and prosperity seems to have gathered the states under her wing, and the people north and south are fattening and flourishing as never before, no even dreamed of before. The good name of the United States is on the tongue of every ruler, statesman, soldier, trader and citizen in all the world, and no more highly respected flag floats on the turret or mast head of the greatest battleships and men of war that plow the deep blue sea and circled the globe honored in all the ports of the world; that floats in the breeze all over this grand and glorious country of ours, with stars and stripes floating over us we can now truly as we live in the land of the free and the home of the brave, and all since the famous Appomattox April day. WRONGS IN THE FARM HOME.

Publicity has been given by the government to the results of a part of its inquiry as to what is wrong in American farm life. The following statements are condensations of inquiries made by a hundred farmers of Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma. They may suggest to other farm homes as means of relief.

All these fathers had in mind, certainly, the fact that, when they left the scene of their labors, the farm would go to the boys. But this, it was just as certain, did not satisfy the boys. Twenty-two farmers in four counties of central Kansas admitted that they never had allowed their sons any pocket money, and they had run away between the ages of fourteen and seventeen.

Thirty-three farmers lived so far from towns, in fertile parts of Kansas and Oklahoma, that their families had no chance to go to church —the most exciting diversion usually presented — except about once a month, when a circuit preacher came along.

A mother of one family of fifteen had never had time to be lonesome, she said; never had time to read the magazines or the papers that were received regularly; never had time to do anything except work and take care of the babies and go to bed. She was always ready to go to bed, she said, and usually she was tired, especially in harvest time. "But I am not discontented," she said in a thin voice. "I'm not lonesome. But the children complain."

Everywhere practically the same reply was heard: "The boys and girls complain." The spirit of unrest manifested itself, usually, when the children were in high-school; it was developed more strongly in the state universities and the colleges.

"Until they begin to see how others live away from the farms they're satisfied," a farmer said. "If they get two years in an agricultural college they come home changed, with new notions; they want all sorts of labor-saving machinery; they want books and papers, they want to quit work at sunset or sooner; they want to go to town every day. We either have to give them what they want or they leave. Young folks are not what they used to be."

"Doesn't that apply chiefly to the boys?" was suggested. "Have you found any labor-saving devices to help the women in their work?"

"No," he admitted. "I guess they are doing their work as well as they always did it. I believe that much of the trouble on farms is caused by the lack of proper system; too many hours of labor. After one of my girls ran away and became a stenographer, we put in a schedule here. We go to supper at six o'clock and do the chores afterward. In that way the women can clear up things by seven o'clock. For many years we didn't get our chores done until nine o'clock and often an hour later. We'd work in the fields till the last minute and that kept supper waiting. That was what drove the girl away. Two of my boys left me, too, but I caught them at Chicago, and they came back on the promise of an allowance. I had never let them have any money. I made an agreement with them, and now they share in the profits after the home expenses are paid."

U. S. NAVY WAS WRECKED

By Trip Around the World According to Story Published in New York World.

The New York World printed the following from its special correspondent in Washington a few days ago:

"The navy department today announced that the sixteen battleships which made a trip around the world are to be remodeled, thus practically confirming the reports that have been current since the return of the fleet that the voyage practically wrecked the navy.

"Since the return of the fleet it has been reported at various times that masts had been sprung, that plates were loosened, that the intricate electrical machinery, including the fire control, was hopelessly out of order, and that other things had happened. Nevertheless the navy department insists that the ships stood the voyage better than expected, which leaves to the imagination what the original expectation or fear had been.

"That sixteen battleships have been laid up for repairs and that sixteen battleships are to be remodeled are facts admitted by the navy department and these facts seem to bear out the reports that the United States navy today is practically useless and out of commission.

"If the plans of the navy department are carried out it is proposed to go back to first principles. In other words, it is proposed to make of the sixteen battleships a type something like the the old Monitor, save that the new type will have more free board. All the cumbersome superstructure which at present adorns the battleships and which affords a splendid mark for the enemy's guns will be taken off.

"All that will appear above the decks will be a turret fore and aft and the funnels of the boilers and a wire 'waste basket' type of mast which will be used for the lookouts.

"It is assured by those who criticise the navy department that this remodeling is an admission that the armor belt on the battleships was misplaced. The innovation raises the armor belt to a point where it will be more effective, because taking off the superstructure will, it is calculated, raise the ships one foot higher in the water and consequently the armor belt will be in the desired position. The ships could not have been raised otherwise without danger of turning turtle or becoming unseaworthy. The fighting masts are to be dispensed with. They have not only proved useless, but cumbersome and easily put out of commission. On the other hand it has been proved that the wire basket type of mast is practically invulnerable and may be punctured many times without danger of collapse."

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, MAY 6, 1909.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Candidates for nomination on the Republican ticket are invited to annonnce themselves through this medium. For this service a flat rate of $5 for each announcement, covering the publication in this column until the nominations are made, has been fixed. The cash should accompany the order.

FOR HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the nomination for member of the House of Delegates, subject to the decision of the Republican Convention, and earnestly solicit the support of my friends throughout the county. If nominated and elected I promise my best endeavors for the advancement of the interests of the people of Garrett county.

W. W. SAVAGE.

Friendsville, March 30, 1909.

TO MAKE THE MACHINE MORE POWERFUL.

If anything were needed to show how little the demand there is in this State for a disfranchising amendment—except on the part of the political leaders and their followers who wish to disfranchise the negro vote for reasons that are perfectly plain—it is furnished by the effort made at every meeting of the politicians to arouse the voters to the importance of the issue. Thursday's meeting of the Democratic State Central Committee was devoted entirely to trying to make the people understand how terribly they suffer by reason of the fact that one-sixth of the voters in this State are negroes and urging them to demonstrate that they are alive to the fact that they do actually suffer. If the evil which they direct so forcibly were really to be attributed to this cause, it would not be necessary to go to so much trouble to make the public sensible of it.

It was the custom of the Indians before they went to war to have a war dance, inflaming their passion by the violence of their physical contortions and inciting their young men to deeds of daring by mimic warfare. So Chairman Vandiver and his valiant assistants think it necessary to inflame the public mind by reciting mischiefs from which the State suffers—with which the negro has as little to do as his brother in Central Africa—and laying the blame upon the negro's shoulder.

There are many indications of the insincerity of the bosses who conceived the amendment and who are urging its adoption, but none so obvious as the answer to the charge made by many leading Democrats to the effect that the adoption of the amendment will give the Democratic machine so strong a hold on the State that only a political revolution will break it. They are forced to admit that it is unwise so to strengthen the hands of the party at the expense of the other. They are, therefore, compelled to resort to as bald a subterfuge as was ever advanced in political argument. They have the effrontery to say that one of the reasons for disfranchising the negro is that it will so divide the white vote as to equalize parties and thus compel both to be on their good behavior! In other words, we are asked to believe that the Democratic machine is actuated in this fight by a desire to make the Republican party stronger.

Even if we believed this to be its purpose, it would remain to determine whether its view of the outcome is better than that which our common sense teaches us to expect when we are fortified in our anticipation by the views of men and of organizations whose good faith we have no reason to suspect. At a meeting held last evening the Reform League, which has done as much as any other body in the State to promote the cause of good government, an association which is absolutely non-partisan, adopted resolutions denouncing the amendment and saying upon the point we are now discussing:

This committee feels that if this amendment were adopted the State of Maryland and the city of Baltimore, instead of being almost evenly divided between the two leading political parties, with the independent voters holding the balance of power, would be turned over to one political party which would have such absolute control that it would require a revolution to dislodge it. Maryland would be a one-party State during the next generation, with the attendant political evils that always result from this condition of affairs, no matter which party is in power, and many of the political reforms which have already been accomplished would be lost.

As between the views of the Democratic State Central Committee and the Reform League on what an amendment will actually accomplish, we do not think the independent voters of the State will hesitate which to accept.

GOOD SOCIETIES.

In some of the cities of the east Removal Societies or Get-Back-to-the-Farm Associations have been formed to help those in the tenement districts and to relieve the congested conditions that effect labor as well as the health of the poor. Such societies would be good for the towns. There are a good many able-bodied idlers there as well as in the cities, some of them idlers not from choice, but because there are too many applicants for the number of places, with the result that there is always sharp competition for the jobs obtainable and reduced wages.

There are 7,000 vacant farms in Pennsylvania alone. The city and town idlers could find profitable employment on these in agricultural pursuits and get away from the disease-breeding tenements into the sunshine and fresh air. It may be said that these people are not farmers and for that reason the farm life does not appeal to them. But a great many people who are living in health and comfort on farms are not real farmers, and many of those who eke out a miserable existence in the cities and towns have no special knowledge of any other occupation, and by study they could become intelligent and successful tillers of the soil as easily as they could master any other calling. Farming is one of the few occupations in which more people are needed at present. The supply of good farmers doesn't equal the demand Too many people have quit the business and that in a large measure accounts for the extravagant prices of farm products. One of the careful students of conditions in Western Canada makes the statement in one of the May magazines that 500,000 farmers from our northwestern states have gone into Canada within the past six years, and that the average amount of money taken by each farmer was $2,000. That is a great loss to the United States. The places of these people must be filled on the farms. More farmers are needed, and if the societies which are being organized shall succeed in turning those who need work in the congested districts to the farms, they will have done something worth while for them and for the country at large.

RAISING STATESMEN.

The proud mother who wants her son to grow up and become a statesman can gain valuable information as to the procedure by consulting the Congressional Record. The biographies of the representatives of the people give the clue.

In the first place, the aspiring parent ought to choose the honest, rugged name of William. There are more congressmen with this cognomen to the square inch in the House of Representatives, than any other—50 out of the total of 393. John is also a favorite, with 37 bearing that front name in the present membership. But William is better. "Bill" sounds good with the masses.

Thirty-one members answer to the name of Charles; 28 to that of James; 17 were baptized Joseph; 15 bear the surname of George; there are 11 Henrys, 10 Thomases, 7 Roberts, and the same number of Franks, 5 Edwards, 4 with the historic "George Washington" as their first two names, and 1 who scorns adornment and calls himself plain "Jack"—Beall of Texas.

Then, too, the far-sighted parent should carefully choose an occupation for the child destined for congressional fame. By all means he should be a lawyer—there are 245 legal lights in the present House, which is away and above every other profession. Second choice is newspaper work. Twenty graduates of journalism or proprietors of newspapers are members. There are 19 who confess to farming in their biographies, 14 bankers, and 9 lumbermen or manufacturers of forest products. There are three telegraphers, two practicing physicians (who by the way always get well advertised whenever anyone is suddenly taken sick around the House chamber, as "Dr. So-and-so, a member from Such-and-such-a-state, attended the patient.") and one actor—Julius Kahn, of California, who still affects a poetic flowing tie and is given to gestures. Of course, it's possible for men with other professions to break into Congress—John K. Tener, of Pennsylvania, a professional baseball player at one time, for instance, achieved the feat. And so did Representative Anderson, of Ohio, who, like the heroes in Oliver Optic's books, arose from the humble walk of newsboy and bootblack. Murphy, of Missouri, and Cushman of Washington, both are proud to write in their little biographies that they were at one time railroad section hands. There are quite a number who declare they were cowboys and punchers.

To be a real representative of the people, however—especially if one comes from a rural district—it sounds best to be able to state in a biography that "he was born and reared on the farm." Exactly 54 representatives claim this distinction in the latest edition of the Congressional Directory. Two others—Webb, of North Carolina, and Carter, of Oklahrma,—however have this "beat to a frazzle," when they proudly include the fact that they first saw light in a log cabin. That is a master stroke. Needham, of California, has a distinction, which he makes much of in his biography—he was born on an emigrant wagon enroute to the great state of California.

When an aspirant for congressional honors is able to tack a war record on his career, it undeniably helps. The longest biography in the Directory of congressmen—that of Representative Keifer, of Ohio, who tells about himself in a matter of seven hundred and eighty words—has a whole lot about services in the Civil and Spanish-American wars. Keifer, however, is the only ex-speaker now a member of the House, so he is entitled to devote a little more space to himself than any one else. The nearest approach to this is Southwick, of New York, with four hundred and fifty words, and Southwick wasn't even a war veteran, let alone an ex-speaker.

The parent from the other side of the water who has the hope of his son becoming a congressman should not despair. A member doesn't necessarily have to be a native of the United States. There are 15 in the present House who were born abroad. Of these, four were from Germany; one from England proper, and one each from Wales, Canada and Nova Scotia; two from Ireland; two from Scotland, two from Sweden, and one from Bohemia.

Marriage Licenses.

The following licenses have been issued by Clerk E. Z. Tower, since our last report:

Henry Harry Hauser, of Hauser, and Julia Enlow, of near Hoyes.

Vernie Simon Schlager, and Bessie May Giles, both of Fairmont, W. Va.

William Donald McLean and Lucinda Alferretta Glotfelty, both of McHenry.

Basie Marion Moreland, of Ridgely, W. Va., and Sophia Wilson, of Cumberland, Md.

Two with request not to publish.

A Mean Thief.

Silas Crow, who resides in Garrett county, not far from Lonaconing, and who is very poor, had a bunch of shingles stolen from him the other night. Silas shaved the shingles because he needed a sack of flour. Silas says he knows the thief, but can't prove it, and he avers that the man who took that bunch of shingles took the bread out of his children's mouths.

Master Bakers Take Hand.

Mr. Henry Lauer, of Oakland, a member of the National Association of Master Bakers, is in receipt of a letter and copies of a resolution and petition to Congress requesting that body to enact a law prohibiting the cornering of food stuffs. A section of the resolution is herewith published by request of the Association:

Resolved, That the National Association of Master Bakers, believing that it is the right of all men to purchase their daily food at prices dictated solely by the laws of supply and demand, and viewing with alarm the growing tendency and oft recurring attempts to corner or control the markets on staple food supplies, such as wheat, corn, etc., by the buying and selling of options or futures, on margins, do respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to absolutely prohibit by the law all such gambling in food supplies.

WASHINGTON COUNTIAN IN FIELD FOR CHIEF JUDGE

Candidacy of Charles D. Wagaman of Hagerstown Is Announced.

One of the most important duties that the voters of Allegany, Washington and Garrett counties will have to discharge in November next will be the selection of a chief judge of the Fourth Judicial Circuit of Maryland, to succeed Judge A. Hunter Boyd, whose term will expire at that time.

In naming a candidate for this high office it is incumbent upon the Republicans of this Circuit to chose a man who will not only worthily represent the best traditions and sentiment of the Republican party, but who is also possessed of those qualifications which are recognized as being essential to a proper and satisfactory performance of the manifold duties of a judge.

Mental vigor and alertness, capacity for work, combined with industry; power to analyze and differentiate in the application of principles—all these are necessary qualities; but above all else in importance, is the quality of fair-mindedness, the faculty of giving due consideration to all sides of questions, and impartially reaching a conclusion. This is what is known as a "judicial temperament" and no man can be a good judge unless he posesses it.

Washington county has a citizen who in an eminent degree has the qualifications herein enumerated and especially is he gifted with the quality of fair-mindedness. We might say that this is his distinguishing characteristic. In addition to this, by reason of his close application to the study of his cases and the experience gained in twenty years of active practice as a lawyer, he is thoroughly versed in the underlying principles of the law, as well as the modes of procedure and practice. In mental training and equipment he fully measures up to the requirements of the office.

His life and record in this community are as an open book. As a man, a citizen, and lawyer he stands in the foremost ranks, and has the respect, esteem and confidence of all our people. Recognizing the existence in this county, and indeed throughout the Fourth Judicial Circuit, of a wide-spread sentiment favorable to the nomination of this citizen, and in response to the popular demand created the Herald is happy to be able to announce that Mr. Charles D. Wagaman will be a canaidate before the Republican Judicial convention for the nomination to the office of chief judge of this circuit. In making this announcement the Herald wishes to say that it heartily endorses the candidacy of Mr. Wagaman and congratulates the Republicans of the county upon the fact that they will be able to present his name to the convention. Mr. Wagaman has been a lifelong Republican and willing and active in the support of Republican measures and policies.

Not as a partisan, but because, he believes that the enforcement of those measures and policies best conserved the welfare of the people. He is in close touch with the Republican sentiment in Western Maryland, and as a candidate for judge will be altogether acceptable to all Republicans, in the circuit, and also to all of those citizens who are advocates of the non partisanship in the judiciary of the state. Mr. Wagaman's nomination and election will be a credit to the Republican party, to the people of Washington county, and of the Fourth Judicial Circuit. As a judge he will vindicate the confidences of his friends and supporters in his ability and his character, and will worthily fill that important and highly responsible office. The Herald is greatly pleased to be able to make this anuouncement and will use every honorable and legitimate means to secure the nomination and election of Mr. Wagaman to the high office to which he aspires, and which he is so well qualified to fill.

CITY ROLLER MILLS.

Rev. R. B. Ward and son, LeMark, of Oakland, were here Saturday preparing to open their cottage at Terra Alta lake for the summer. — Preston Republican.

Messrs. R. T. Browning, William Miller and G. Semmes Hamill, who were in Baltimore a day or two last week at meeting of the Democratic State Committee, returned to Oakland Friday morning.

Rev. J. A. McClelland, former pastor of the Oakland Presbyterian church, but now stationed at Grafton where he occupies the pulpit of the Presbyterian church, spent last Thursday afternoon and Friday in Oakland.

Mr. N. U. Bond, on his way home from Alexander, the seat of the new operations of the Croft Lumber Company, in which Mr. Bond is a large stockholder, stopped off in Oakland for an hour or two last Thursday afternoon.

Mr. Joseph Rembold, of Preston county, was in Oakland Monday and Tuesday on business and called at this office. During the winter Mr. Rembold suffered with a combination of diseases and was bedfast for upwards of four months.

D. E. Offutt, the well known Oakland merchant, and member of the firm of Offutt & Lakin, was here as the guest of James S. Lakin Tuesday. It was Mr. Offutt's first visit to Terra Alta for more than two years.—Terra Alta Republican.

Mr. John W. Davis, of Oakland, accompanied his mother-in-law, Mrs. Ralph Wilburn, of Terra Alta, to Baltimore, last Monday night where Mrs. Wilburn will receive surgical treatment for an ailment with which she has been suffering some months.

Mrs. J. I. Hawkes and daughter, Miss Sallie, of London, England, who were at Friendsville a few days recently visiting Mrs. Hawkes' brother, Mr. R. C. McCandlish, came to Oakland yesterday afternoon and from here went to Chicago, where they will be the guests of relatives before returning to London.

A bad freight wreck occurred at Bloomington last Saturday. One train, with Mr. J. E. Howell as conductor, which was flagged had stopped at Bloomington; another train coming east with Mr. William Smith as engineer and Mr. C. Glover as conductor, ran away, running into the rear end of the train which was standing there and turned over the engine. Fortunately no one was hurt, but traffic was delayed for several hours.

Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Wight and their daughter, Miss Anna, will again occupy a Deer Park Hotel cottage this summer. Indeed before the close of the last season, the Wights engaged the same dwelling for this year. They were greatly benefitted by their sojourn in the mountains, and are looking forward to a renewal of health benefits this summer. Mr. Wight is the manager of freight traffic of the B. and O. R. R. Company with offices in Baltimore City.

About June first a new postage stamp of special design will be issued by the department to commemorate the development of the Alaska-Yukon-Pacific territory. This stamp will be rectangular in shape, and of the 2-cent denomination only, printed in red. At the top and bottom are panels containing respectively the words "U. S. Postage" and "Two Cents." In the center the larger part of a circle rests on the lower panel and incloses a ribbon bearing the words "Alaska-Yukon-Pacific 1909," and in the center of the circle appears a portrait of William H. Seward, who as Secretary of State, conducted the negotiations for the purchase of Alaska from Russia. The name "William H. Seward" appears under the portrait. On either side is an elipse containing the Arabic Numeral 2 with laurel branches as a background.

About two weeks ago, a man was in this city claiming to represent Dr. S. T. Burch & Co., specialist-chiropodist, of Washington D. C. Among other things he claimed to cure corns in five days or pay $100. We understand he did quite an extensive business here. A business man of Meyersdale wrote to the chief of police in Washington, giving the address given on the cards as the office of Dr. Burch & Co., and asked if there was such a party there. The reply from the chief of Police reads: "There is no physician, druggist or firm by the name of S. T. Burch. Would suggest that you consult with the chief of police of your town with a view to having a warrant issued and his arrest caused." Of course the "corn doctor" has moved on to new pastures, but this is one more warning to people to patronize home people and leave strangers alone.—Meyersdale Republican.

AN EXPLODING COOKING STOVE INJURES CHILDREN

"With a roar and a crash a cooking stove in the kitchen of John Metheny, who lives at Hoye's Run, on rural route No. 1 out of Terra Alta, blew up the other evening, painfully injuring two of Mr. Metheny's children and so exciting his wife that she fainted and was with difficulty restored to consciousness.

"What caused the explosion is a mystery. Mr. Metheny and his injured son, Arley, fourteen years old, were in town Monday, and though the father had made many attempts to find out the cause of the accident, he said he had utterly failed. He agreed that it may have been the result of water in the wood becoming heated into steam, or of some peculiar chemical combination in the fuel. But this was only conjecture.

"It was a week ago Friday, in the evening, that young Arley took some recently hatched ducks to the kitchen to warm them. They were in a box which the lad was holding by the stove. Mrs. Metheny and the six-year-old daughter, Zena, were there and all were looking at the little ducklings when the explosion, without warning, occurred. The whole top was hurled from the stove. Pieces of a broken lid struck the two children about the faces and bodies, and they ran screaming from the house, just as Mr. Metheny, who had heard the noise of the blast while working in the yard, rushed in. He subdued the fire quickly to save the house and then gave his attention to his unconscious wife, who had fainted when the crash came, and the wounded boy and girl. Neighbors were called in. The hurts of the children were not serious and were given home treatment and bandaged up.

"For a long time Mrs. Metheny remained unconscious. Water was dashed in her face and many other ways of restoring her were resorted to before she came to.

"The ducklings were destroyed by the explosion."

The Tax Rate in Garrett County.

The Garrett County Commissioners have fixed the county tax rate for this year at $1.02 on the $100. This is 4 cents lower than last year. It was stated the other day by one of the officials of Garrett county that much property in the mountain county is grossly under valued, the official declaring that coal lands which are selling at $100 an acre are assessed at only $4. That such a condition as this exists is the fault of the County Commissioners, who have ample authority under the law to appoint clerks and assessors and to make a new assessment. Such undervaluation of any particular class of property is a wrong to the owners of other property, putting double burdens upon them.

The assessable basis in Garrett for 1908 was $7,673,348. If there is any large area of lands so greatly undervalued as certain coal lands are said to be, then by a re-assessment the basis would be vastly increased, possibly doubled. In that case the tax rate would be probably only about one-half the present rate if the appropriations were the same. The Commissioners made an increase of $4000 for public schools, appropriating $24,000 for that purpose. The amount levied for the public roads was $13,936.53. A new item in the levy was an appropriation for extinguishing forest fires. That appropriation is dedicated to an excellent use. In the mountains of Garrett there are extensive forests containing a great wealth of fine timber. Much of it is destroyed each year by fire, and it is a wise act of the County Commissioners to take steps to prevent this destruction.—Baltimore Sun.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. Week's Pay Taken from His Pocket by Highwayman.

Mont Harris, night operator on the Western Maryland Railroad at Harrison, W. Va., son of D. Harris, a merchant of Elk Garden, was assualted and robbed at midnight Saturday after he had received his pay.

Harris had started for his boarding-house when he was attacked and thrown to the ground, a pistol held in his face, and his pockets rifled of $25. The thief then, at the point of a pistol, marched him up the railroad beyond Dodson bridge, told him to remain there until the east freight passed, and then escaped.

Injured By a Horse.

Yesterday afternoon Frederick, son of Mr. and Mrs. Fred. A. Thayer, was painfully hurt by a horse he had ridden to Mr. Thayer's farm near Hutton when the animal with the boy on its back attempted to lay down in a plowed field and roll. Seeing the danger his son was in Mr. Thayer called to the horse and it jumped up and in so doing unseated the boy who fell to the ground with one foot in the stirrup. This frightened the animal and it ran backward for a considerable distance when fortunately the lad's foot was released and he fell out of harm's way. In the effort made by the boy to free himself from the stirrup his leg was painfully bruised and sprained and as a result he suffered intensely for a number of hours.

Prof. F. S. Matthews' Lectures.

The visit of a scientist to Oakland is an event of such a rare occurrence that no one should fail to see and hear Prof. F. S. Matthews, of Cambridge, Mass., who speaks at the school house Thursday (today) at 8 p. m., and Friday at 3:30 p. m. and again at 8 p. m. He is a popular lecturer on two branches of natural science, viz: "Birds" and "Flowers" and has the national reputation of presenting these subjects in a graphic and interesting manner to the unscientific mind. These lectures are given under the auspices of the Normal School and we hope the people of this vicinity will show their appreciation by extending a liberal patronage. The admission to the three lectures is 50 cents or 25 cents for a single lecture. Tickets on sale at the Oakland Pharmacy.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man marooned by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.

In Which I Meet My Crew.

The polite hotel clerk halted me as I passed his desk on the way out with information that a drunken naval officer—evidently Sanchez—had been there twice already seeking me, had also asked for Lord Darlington, and would return again at ten o'clock. I thanked him, smiling to myself, wondering if the English nobleman was to be challenged also, and promptly disappeared into the night without. The unfortunate affair with the aggrieved lieutenant had become a small matter no longer troubling me.

I have wandered by night through most of the seaports of the world, knowing well the intricacies and dark places of Port Said, Melbourne and Calcutta, but I doubt if even the unspeakable orient can equal for dirt, squalor, crime and peril those narrow, crooked alleyways where sailors most do congregate against the Valparaiso water-front. Here gather in bestial rioting the scum of the South seas, and here flourish their parasites. Any night a trip alone through those foul lanes is of the kind to test strong nerves; but on this special occasion, the way filled with pandemonium and drunkenness, the entire city a riot of noisy violence, the populace aroused to fierce hate toward all foreigners, the passage was one of constantly recurring danger. The street lights, few and far between, were mere blotches of color winking feebly at the surrounding darkness, the rough cobblestone pavement underfoot was irregular and deceitful, while drunken crowds, either quarrelsome or maudlingly affectionate, surged aimlessly about, gesticulating and yelling with Latin fervor. However, I knew the way well, and kept myself hidden from observation by hovering close beneath the protecting shadows of the buildings, drawing well back within doorways to permit the noiser parties of revelers to pass, and then hurrying forward along the deserted streets. I stumbled over the body of more than one drunken man, while sounds of quarreling were borne to me through the open door of every low taproom I passed. The scum of Valparaiso had come to the top, the fires of hell burning fiercely.

Pedro Rodrigues' den stood somewhat back from the narrow lane it fronted, flanked and concealed by taller buildings on either side. It was a ramshackle, wooden affair, sagging sadly at one corner, the half dozen steps leading to the open door being only dimly lighted. As it was a well-known resort, frequented almost entirely by foreign seamen who would scarcely be safe on the streets such a night as this, it was no surprise to discover the taproom densely crowded with sailor-men, and to distinguish a voice singing lustily in vigorous English, to an accompaniment of glasses pounding upon the rough tables. Indeed, a wild, hilarious mob greeted me loudly as I pressed aside the heavy curtain and stepped within. I cast a quick, comprehensive glance over the faces, upturned through the enveloping haze—Swedes and Finns from the North sea, Dutchmen of the Baltic, hairy Englishmen from the channel, Yankees of the West Atlantic, beach-combers from out of the South seas, with here and there a negro or brown-faced Kanaka to add to the variety. Faith, it was a choice collection, as though the wide waters of the world had been skimmed to bring together that rare crew of beauties. Perched high upon a table, his long legs encased in sea boots, seated astride a chair, sat the singer, his mop of coarse red hair standing erect, his jaw that of a bulldog, the scar of a recent knife wound showing ghastly across one cheek, his blue shirt open at the throat to reveal a hairy chest; beneath thatched brows his eyes glinted and gleamed in a ferocious attempt at good humor.

"Sing, ye bullies!" he roared, after one inquiring glance toward me, bringing his heavy glass down on the back of the chair. "Lay it out fer the gent, whut has just come callin' on ye. Tune up, ye sea dogs. I'm no hopera hartist here to entertain ye. Give us a swing to the chorus now, or I'll shy this mug into yer bloomin' faces. Lift the tune, my hearties, and show the dagoes outside whut ye can do. Now at it:

The captain's bride was fair to see;
Swing hard! bend low!
She mocked at him, she smiled at me;
Swing hard! bend low!

"Oh, to hell wid that sorter love-sick stuff," cried a protesting voice, hoarsely. "That's no good sailor song, Bill. Give us somethin' to start our pipes."

The giant in the chair scowled.

"Ye're a lot o' dubs, an' not fit sailor-men," he retorted, savagely, draining his glass; "but I've got a chorus ye'll sing or fight me, an' dam' if I care much which. Now take a grip at this:

A mighty man was Pat McCann,
Who sailed upon the sea;
Within his hold he hid the gold,
He stole in Barbaree.
In Barbaree, in Barbaree
The men lie mute,
He has the loot,
He found in Barbaree.

They were still at it, the motley, mongrel crew, their hoarse, drink-thickened voices roaring out lines full of the fierce swing of the deep sea, their glasses pounding in unison on the tables, as I pushed my way through them up to the sloppy bar and faced the fellow standing behind.

"Is there a Yankee whaleman here by the name of Tuttle?" I asked.

He stared at me, his eyes squinting, while the wild chorus began to die away like a clock run down.

"Bill, whar's Cap' Tut'?" he called out finally. "Here's a cove wants him."

The red-headed giant, perched aloft on the chair, flung one hand indifferently across his shoulder toward the rear of the room.

"Come on again, mates," he roared. "Another drink, and another song. Spit it out this time—'Swing hard! Bend low!'"

"He's yonder in the back room; through that door, mate," said the bartender, shortly. "Better not tread on any of the lads' feet goin' in, unless maybe ye're here to-night huntin' trouble. They're just 'bout drunk enough now to be ready to start a row."

I picked my way with caution, the fierce lilt of that devils' chorus stunning my ears, the hairy faces confronting me scowlingly suggestive of any crime. Saint Andrew! I thought soberly, if this was still the day of pirates here was a brood ready for hatching. With a feeling of positive relief I pressed open the heavy wooden door, stepped within and closed it carefully behind me. So tightly fitting and solid the wood it instantly shut out completely the mad riot of the barroom. It was like coming into a new world. Two men sat alone at a small, round table smoking, between them a short-necked black bottle with glasses, and a scattered deck of greasy cards. The one nearest where I stood, tall, long-limbed, angular, his face thin and made to appear more so from a sandy chin-whisker, had his knees swung over the arm of his chair, a bald spot on the top of his head shining conspicuously beneath the rays of the lamp. His companion was considerably younger, somewhat trim of build, with black, curling hair, and small mustaches curled upward at the tips. He was of a complexion to make me think him either a creole or quadroon, but with smiling lips and a light in his merry eyes bespeaking a temperament of good humor.

"Capt. Eli Tuttle?" I questioned, doubtfully.

The older man slowly deposited his feet on the floor and stood up. He was a trifle round-shouldered, attired in a black frock coat which dangled to the knees, and his eyes of cold gray narrowed into mere slits as he inspected me with undisguised suspicion.

"The spirit which for 70 years hath made answer to that earthly name still abideth within this fleshly body," he responded solemnly, in a voice seemingly from the very pit of his stomach. "I am still permitted to sail the seas, thus known to the children of men, awaiting in patience the hour of translation."

To be greeted thus in such a spot stunned me for the instant, my cheeks flushing as I read undisguised amusement in the upturned face of the creole. My teeth shut together hard.

"You are Eli Tuttle, then, formerly master of the whaling bark Betsy?"

"Even so, young man," his lean face perfectly emotionless, his long fingers outspread flat on the table. "Eli Tuttle of New Bedford, once the chief of sinners, but now communing with the higher life of the spirit world. Associate me not with yonder ungodly crew, blind to the truth of the beyond," and he snapped his fingers softly toward the closed door. "In this world saints and sinners must indeed mingle bodily, yet not in any communion of spirit. It was for peaceful meditation that friend De Nova and I deserted yonder scene of revelry and sought this secluded spot. Truly the good book saith that where one or two are gathered together in his name there is he also in the midst of them."

"Sit down, mate!" he exclaimed, genially, kicking up a chair. "After you know zis ol' hypocrite as well as I do, his communion viz spirits won't bozzer you much. Help yourself to drink, an' wash the taste out you' mouth."

Tuttle wheeled about and stared at his companion, his thin jaw working savagely; but the creole went on rolling a cigarette indifferently between his brown fingers, his white teeth gleaming. I remained standing, my hand on the back of the chair, intently studying the pair.

"I come directly from Don Castillo," I said, quietly, facing the Yankee, and determined to get down to business, "and desire to speak with you alone."

His glinting eyes narrowed perceptibly, and his jaws crunched down upon the tobacco in his cheek.

"'Tis safe enough with him," he acknowledged rather ungraciously, his voice becoming nasal as he pointed his chin-beard toward the other. "De Nova is second officer."

I drew back the chair and sat down, realizing that I now possessed the attention of both.

"I have been appointed to assume Capt. Castelar's duties," I announced quietly. "Do either of you care to examine my papers?"

Tuttle spat silently into the sawdust, while De Nova exhibited his white teeth in a grin. The eyes of the two men met.

"I rather guess your papers won't cut much ice in this yere affair," returned the former with deliberate insolence, "being as how we don't either of us give a tinker's dam' fer Peru, if if you'll pardon my sayin' so plainly."

His mask had disappeared as by magic, and I realized instantly the real nature of the man.

"You mean no enlistment has been made, either by you, or the men under you?"

"That's just about the size of it, mister," his tone full of unconcealed contempt, his leg flung once again over the arm of the chair. "We agreed to do this one particular job fer a certain consideration, but we're none of us Peruvian sailor-men, and consequently don't give a hang for your papers. Ain't that about it, De Nova?"

The creole nodded, still smiling pleasantly, the blue smoke curling lazily up from the end of his cigarette. Evidently the two were actively engaged in taking my measure, and this was to be a case of man against man, rather than the exercise of any delegated authority. I might as well throw my commission into the fire for any real value it possessed here. All right; I had met and attended to their kind before.

"I am delighted to understand the situation so clearly and quickly," I said, sharply, throwing a note of authority into my voice and manner. "It simplifies my task. Now listen to me, Mr. Tuttle," giving him his formal title, "and you likewise, De Nova. I probably care as little for those papers as either of you, but, nevertheless, I am in command. Do you both clearly comprehend that?—I am in command! It will be just as well for you not to attempt any horse-play. I am no dago sea-officer, but a North American sailor, and I didn't come crawling into my first ship through a cabin window. I've tamed mutinous crews before now, and when I'm up against sea-scum I can hit as hard as the next fellow. If either of you desire to test my qualities as a buckomate, I'm here to accommodate you."

Neither answered, but I read their conclusion in their eyes.

"That's all I need to say now," I went on. "It's up to you to fish or cut bait. You fellows have nothing to gain by opposing me, and I hope you possess sense enough to know it. De Nova, where have I ever met you before?"

The creole's face instantly brightened again, his white teeth gleaming under the black mustache.

"So monsieur remember," he lisped gently, leaning forward on the table. "I thought maybe you forget altogether 'bout zat time. But I know you at once w'en you come in. It make me laugh to see zis Yankee try bait you like you was a dago steamboater. Bah, I know you all right for sailor-man; I know you do business."

"But I am unable to place you."

"No, not yet; maybe you will w'en I say more." He spoke rapidly, gesticulating with excitement. "It was a little ship off Hatteras; ze storm five days, an' all wreck. It was a steamer, w'ite, wiss red stacks, zat took off ze crew, an' it was hell of a job. Zat was ze story, monsieur; I was mate of ze Cymbeline."

I knew him then instantly, my memory picturing anew the cold, gray dawn, the green, angry seas, the helpless, sodden hulk heaving sickeningly to its death, and those water-drenched forms we hauled over the sinking rail into our tossing boat. I held forth my hand, and his brown fingers, hard as iron, closed over it in a grip to be felt.

"Sure, it's come back, mate," I said. "I rather guess I can count on you."

His dark eyes met mine in frank honesty.

"Running arms for the Cuban revolutionists then, weren't you?" I asked, indifferently. "What since?"

He shrugged his shoulders, glancing across at Tuttle, and fingering his mustache.

"Sacre! it has been as ze devil drove," easily. "Ze last was sandalwood in ze South seas. I care little, so ze pay be good."

"Then we'll get down to facts," and I nodded toward the closed door. He exhibited his yellow teeth, his eyes narrowing.

"They'll be about all ye'll want to tackle, I guess," he volunteered, with some assumption of cheerfulness, "unless maybe you decide to turn this expedition into piracy, an' give 'em half the spoils. They're that sort, all right."

I straightened back in my chair, my jaws set hard, my gaze endeavoring vainly to catch and hold his shifty eye.

"Mr. Tuttle," I said, sternly, "as I understand matters I am captain this cruise, and you're mate. Whenever I desire your advice I'll probably ask for it. Just at present please confine yourself to my questions. What crew have you?"

The expression of his face was angry enough, yet he evidently thought best to answer civilly.

"First and second officers, boatswain and gunner, five coal-heavers, the rest seamen."

"Nationality?"

"Every mongrel race under the sky."

"You have no engineer?"

"Couldn't pick up any; however, there's one on board, and, no doubt, we can persuade him to stick to the job."

The man's manner and tone remained surly and insolent, but I gripped my indignation and held back the hot words burning my tongue. It was necessary that I make the best of it now, but after we were once safely at sea I intended very shortly to take the measure of this Yankee whaleman. My eyes wandered toward the olive-tinted face of De Nova, barely visible through the enveloping smoke of his cigarette. The latter nodded cheerfully, as though he interpreted my thought.

"Oh, ze men was all right, monsieur," he put in, smilingly. "Maybee a bit rough, but, sacre, w'at would you?" his shoulders rising to the question. "Mr. Tuttle he grumble, but it was all bark. I know him, an' I razzer have him so zan hear him talk to ze spirits; w'en he do zat, it make me sick, by gar!"

"You blaspheming, mongrel infidel," the whaleman's nasal voice rising shrill with anger. "I don't have to count heads in order to lift my soul to the other world."

"There is liable to be fighting enough before morning," I interposed, sharply, fearing a quarrel, "without comrades falling out about their belief. Leave that for lubbers ashore to argue over. Now tell me what arrangements have been made for boarding the Esmeralda?"

Tuttle spat into the sawdust, his gaze still on De Nova.

"Two boats concealed beneath the piling of the Mercantile Company's coal wharf, a whaleboat and a cutter."

"Any arms?"

"A dozen rifles, six in each boat."

I arose to my feet, glancing at my watch in the dim light. He had not given me the customary "sir" in any of his replies, yet I ignored the omission, willing for the time being to sink formality for the sake of action.

"Very well, Mr. Tuttle. Have your men there in an hour from now. They had better travel in parties of two; and see that they start out sober. You understand these orders clearly, I hope, sir—have them there in an hour, sober. De Nova, you must know how to bring sailor-men to their senses; get busy with that gang. Now work rapidly and quickly, both of you, for if we get caught, this is likely to be a hanging matter for all of us."

As He Saw It.

Along with the dinner the old farmer had ordered in the city restaurant the waiter brought a diminutive pat of butter. Finally the old man discovered it, and, calling the waiter, he said: "Say, mister, ef yew ain't tew bizzy, I wish yew'd wipe that air grease-spot off that plate an' put some butter on it."

A Bad Catch.

Hurrying out on hearing a commotion, I found that it was my little three-year-old sister, Muriel, whose cap and hair were covered with blood. As soon as I had bathed her head and quieted her, I asked her the cause of the accident. "I threw that brick up for God to catch," was the reply, "and he didn't catch it."—Delineator.

FOR HOME COOKING

RECIPES NEW AND OLD, BUT ALL OF VALUE.

German Pork Croquettes—How to Prepare Baked Corned Ham—Egg Sandwiches Put Up in a Novel Manner.

German Pork Croquettes.—Chop an onion fine, fry it in butter and add to one pound of minced raw pork. Add also 12 boned anchovies chopped fine, a tablespoonful of chopped capers, two heaping tablespoonfuls of bread crumbs, three unbeaten eggs, three tablespoonfuls of sour cream and pepper and nutmeg to taste. Mix well with the hands and form into cutlets and saute in hot fat. They can also be shaped into croquettes and dipped in egg and crumbs, frying in deep fat.

Baked Corned Ham.—Soak ham over night. In the morning clean and pare and wash with vinegar, but do not dry. Put into a roasting pan, skin side down, covering the pared side with a thick paste of flour and water. Mix together one cupful of cold water, half a cupful of vinegar, a tablespoonful of onion juice. Pour over the ham, cover and bake, allowing 30 minutes to the pound. Baste frequently. Take up the ham, scrape off the paste, remove the skin, sprinkle with cracker crumbs and brown in the oven. Serve either hot or cold.

Sandwiches for Tea.—The great number of girls who ask friends in for five o'clock tea to meet some guest or friend from another city want something new and palatable to serve. They can make excellent egg sandwiches by a recipe that will give satisfaction to all. The yolks of hard-boiled eggs are rubbed to a paste with French mustard, olive oil, vinegar, salt, a bit of minced pickle, a teaspoon of chopped parsley and three olives minced. If the stuffed olives are used, the sandwiches will be that much nicer. This is spread on slices of thin sandwich bread from which the crusts have been carefully cut. If one wishes to ornament each sandwich, the half of an olive can be put on the top.

Lima Bean Salad.—Among the simpler salads to be served is one of French lima beans—flageolets they are called. These are bought by the can and kept in the pantry for emergency use. The beans are drained and served on fresh lettuce leaves covered with a French dressing, which is thickly sprinkled with paprika.

White Sauce.—Take one heaping teaspoonful of flour, two tablespoonfuls of butter, one pint of milk. Parboil the mushrooms, either one and a half or two and a half cans, and add to the sauce a few minutes before removing it from the fire. Add a little white pepper to mushrooms.

Suet Pudding.

Sift together three cupfuls flour, a tablespoonful soda, a teaspoonful cinnamon, and a teaspoonful mixed cloves and allspice. Add one-half cupful finely chopped suet, one cupful each molasses and milk, a half cupful seeded raisins, dredged with flour, and a quarter cupful shredded citron or water melon rind that has been candied and dried.

Mix well, pour in buttered molds and place in the cooking vessel with water to come almost to the top of the molds. Cover and boil 15 minutes, then place in the cooker and cook four or five hours.

Apple Toast.

Cut six apples into quarters, take the core out, peel and cut in slices. Put in the saucepan an ounce of butter, then throw over the apples two ounces of white powdered sugar and two tablespoons of water. Stew quickly. When tender cut two or three slices of bread one-half inch thick and fry in the frying pan a nice yellowish color in a little butter. When nice and crisp place them on a dish and sprinkle with a little sugar. Put apples one inch thick. Serve hot.

Excellent Poultry Dressing.

Chop fine the heart and liver of the fowl, a little parsley and small-size onion, six medium-size cold potatoes. Half pound of pork sausage. Half loaf of stale bread crumbs, dampen the crust; half teaspoonful of nutmeg, salt and pepper to taste. Chop all together, then mix well with four lightly beaten eggs. This is sufficient for one large chicken. Double amount for turkey.

Pumpkin Pudding.

Take one pound of butter, beaten to a cream, with one pound of pulverized sugar. Beat the yolks of six eggs to a stiff froth and stir them into the sugar.

Grate the rind of two lemons and squeeze out the juice; add one wine glassful of wine and one of rose water. Roll fine four water crackers and stir in; beat all well together.

Have ready dishes lined with paste; put in the mixture and bake.

Hint for the Young Cook.

In making cookies or doughnuts have the dough very cold before beginning to roll out and roll a small portion at a time. Even a beginner will have no trouble about its sticking to the board, if this suggestion is followed.—The Housekeeper.

Extract White Without Yolk.

If one wishes to use only the white of the egg, break a small hole in one end of the shell and let the white run out. The yolk will keep moist in the shell for a long time.

PAUL AT ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA

Sunday School Lesson for May 9, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 13:13-52. Memory verses 38, 39.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"The word of the Lord was published throughout all the region."—Acts 13:49.

TIME.—Immediately after the last lesson; probably (according to Prof. Ramsay), in the summer of A. D. 46 or 47.

PLACE.—Perga the capital of Pamphylia, on the southern coast of Asia Minor, and Antioch, the capital of Pisidia, southern Galatia, about 100 miles northeast.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

Hitherto (see Acts 13:7, etc.) it had been "Barnabas and Saul;" now it is "Paul and Barnabas" (vs. 43, 46), or "Paul and his company," including Barnabas, John Mark, and perhaps others. Paul's ability as a leader has been proved at Cyprus, and was afterwards unquestioned.

V. 18. "John (Mark) departing from them returned to Jerusalem," his home. 1. Perhaps he did not like to see Paul superseding his cousin Barnabas. 2. Perhaps his mother was sick. 3. Perhaps, as one brought up strictly in Jerusalem, he objected to Paul's free intercourse with the Gentiles. 4. Perhaps he dreaded the perils of travel in the wild, bandit-infested region that lay before them. 5. Perhaps he had been weakened by the fever and felt unable to go on. Paul was not satisfied with the reason, whatever it was (Acts 15:37-40), and separated from Barnabas when, later, he insisted on taking Mark along. But Mark was ready for the second missionary journey, and was afterward restored to Paul's good opinion (see Inductive Study 2). "No man ever became great or good except through many and great mistakes."—Gladstone. "The only people who make no mistakes are dead people. I saw a man last week who has not made a mistake for 4,000 years. He is a mummy in the Egyptian department of the British museum."—H. L. Wayland.

V. 24. "They went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day," as was their custom. Thus they wisely made their first appeal to the Jews.

The Sermon as a Whole. "The task before Paul was difficult. He had to win the confidence and hold the attention of an audience to which he was quite unknown. He had to keep the ground of Israel's peculiar history and hope, and yet to show that at the holy city itself the Messiah had been rejected and crucified. But St. Paul was the very man for an emergency."—Donald Fraser, D. D.

"They keynote of Paul's sole message, repeated on a hundred occasions, and with infinite variations of emphasis, is found in St. Luke's account of his visit to Athens, in the words, 'he preached Jesus and the resurrection.' This first of his sermons of which we possess any portion may perhaps be regarded as a type of the Pauline sermon."—Rev. George Francis Greene.

It was (1) tactful, taking his hearers on their own ground; (2) humble, leaving himself out and exalting Christ; (3) courageous and frank, not hesitating to state the truth though it would offend preconceived views; (4) Biblical, bound up with the Scripture throughout; (5) practical, coming to a personal application, ending, as Lyman Beecher said every section should end, with a "snapper."

Forgiveness, through Christ. That truth, as always in Paul's preaching, was the climax of this sermon. "Forgiveness," R. V., remission "of sins," is, literally, the putting or sending them away. It includes the removal of the penalty for sin, though not immediately all the consequences of sin. It includes the cleansing of the heart from sin and restoration to God's favor. These are wonderful and priceless gifts, and Christ offers them to us for the asking.

V. 45. "Envy (jealousy), when the Jews saw the multitudes" (of Gentiles). The Jewish leaders were angry (1) because others and strangers did what they could not do themselves; (2) because they differed from Paul's teaching, and especially his application of the Messianic hopes to the condemned and crucified Jesus; (3) because they themselves felt condemned by such warnings as those in vs. 40, 41; (4) because, though they would be pleased if the Gentiles would become Jewish proselytes by conformity to circumcision and other requirements, they objected strenuously to their admission on easier terms, such as Paul proposed.

Missionary Expulsions. This was the first of many similar expulsions suffered by Paul, and those were only the beginnings of such experiences endured by missionaries in all lands. Thus Judson and his comrades were driven from Calcutta. Thus Milne was driven from Canton, and compelled to begin missionary labors for China from the Malay Peninsula. Thus in 1835 all the missionaries were driven, from Japan for two centuries. Thus John G. Paton, after a thousand perils, was driven from the island of Tanna. But in every case Christianity has returned, all the stronger for its experience of persecution.

What Is My Attitude Toward Truth? This question is of fundamental importance. The lesson illustrates four ways of answering it: (1) John Mark's way, following the truth while the road is easy, but deserting it when it becomes disagreeable and dangerous; (2) Paul's way, following the truth at all hazards, eagerly and joyously, wherever it leads; (3) the way of the Antioch Jewish leaders, opposing the truth when it offends their pride and self-esteem and prejudices; (4) the way of the Gentile converts, accepting the truth readily and humbly, and publishing it abroad.

President's Power Greater Than That of Any European Ruler. -:- -:-

By Ex-Governor JOHN L. BATES of Massachusetts.

OUR attention has recently been very forcefully brought to the difference between European government of the old days and today. EUROPE HAS BEEN ADVANCING TOWARD LIBERTY EVER SINCE AMERICA SET THE PACE ALONG DIFFERENT LINES.

The people of England formerly rose against the tyrannies of monarchs and lords. Today it is but once in awhile that the house of lords dare oppose the house of commons. The king has PRACTICALLY NO EXECUTIVE POWER. In France the whole aim of that republican form of government is to take from the executive power, and the chamber of deputies rules there. In Italy we find a similar condition. The king does not dare oppose any measure from the lower branch of the government.

In Germany we have the emperor who claims descendency from the Charlemagnes and the Caesars. After saying, when he came to the throne, that he would never have a ruler above him on the throne, he has just assured his people that he will not in the future interfere with the policies of the nation, especially in international policies.

We have departed from the old debate, and even the town meeting is not what it used to be. In our legislatures and our congress there is even less discussion and more and more HEED TO ONE CENTRALIZED POWER. In our cities we have tried to remedy evils by centralization of government, but it has failed.

WE HAVE BEEN BUILDING UP EXECUTIVES AT THE EXPENSE OF OUR LEGISLATIVE BODIES, WHICH ARE COMPOSED OF THE PEOPLE'S REPRESENTATIVES. IT IS TIME TO STOP AND CONSIDER. MADISON, JEFFERSON AND WASHINGTON ALL SAID THAT AS LONG AS WE KEPT THE THREE DEPARTMENTS OF EXECUTIVE, LEGISLATIVE AND JUDICIAL SEPARATE THERE WOULD BE NO DANGER OF THE PRESERVATION OF LIBERTY. WE OUGHT TO PASS A LAW TO PREVENT EXECUTIVES IN THE FUTURE FROM GETTING TOO MUCH POWER FROM THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH.

There is no student of the times, so far as I know, who does not say that the PRESIDENT HAS MORE POWER THAN ANY KING OR EMPEROR. There is no doubt that we suffer some things because there is no national law, but in taking powers from the state and reposing them in the national government let us beware that we do not give up some of these things intended for the maintenance of a REPUBLIC INSTEAD OF AN EMPIRE.

American Trade Invasion of Orient Will Lead to Conflict.

By Colonel JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, Prominent Lawyer of Chicago.

HISTORY establishes that every country which has advanced its commerce or its conquests to foreign soil has had to MAINTAIN IT WITH CONFLICT. None such has ever escaped war. The Israelite into Egypt, Rome into Africa, England into India, Russia into Japan, present the records of these established precedents.

AMERICA INTO THE ORIENT WILL NOT ESCAPE THE SAME RESULT. DESTINY HAS CAST THE DIE DECREEING THE GREATEST CONFLICT OF MODERN GENERATIONS TO TAKE PLACE UPON THE WATERS OF THE PACIFIC, WHILE THE MOST STUPENDOUS CLASH OF ARMS IN CIVILIZED DAYS IS DESTINED BETWEEN THE WHITE MAN AND THE YELLOW UPON THE PACIFIC'S SHORES. WE MAY HOPE TO AVERT THE CONFLICT AND TEMPORARILY BY INTERCHANGE OF DIPLOMATIC ASSURANCES POSTPONE IT.

Copyright by Halen, New York.

Napoleon prophesied that the civilized world would be European or Cossack, to which we add that AMERICA MUST BE MISTRESS OF THE PACIFIC OR CONQUERED BY IT.

The rivalry of commerce, the demand of the oriental for equal citizenship and unrestricted immigration in turn for the enjoyment of financial exploitation in their country for the enrichment of those who invade it in the name of America will force the issue, and IT WILL BURST AS SUDDENLY IN ITS FURY UPON US AS A GATHERING STORM SENDS ITS HURRICANE TO THE EARTH with but warnings of the whispering winds.

In such an hour it is the CITIZEN SOLDIERY which will be the safety and the succor of our land.

College Athletics -:- -:- -:- -:- Are a Necessity.

By Professor JAMES EARL RUSSELL of Columbia University.

DESPITE all criticism, college sports and athletics are HERE TO STAY until something better is found. They afford healthful pastime for many who take only unimportant parts. There is variety enough to hold the interest of all.

Even football, the most maligned of all sports, is worth playing, provided it can be a clean sport. There should be no fear of serious harm from a few bruises and sprains and broken bones. They are the PRICE YOUTH PAYS FOR GOOD HEALTH AND ANIMAL SPIRITS. They are part of the cost of learning how to lead and be led in the practical affairs of life.

The curse of it all is its TAINT OF PROFESSIONALISM, a misnomer, by the way, because true professionalism is guided by the highest ethical motives. The fault lies in exaggerating the element of contest and in MAKING THE DETERMINATION TO WIN PARAMOUNT to all other considerations.

BOTH COLLEGE STUDIES AND COLLEGE SPORTS ARE MEANS TO AN END, THE CHIEF PURPOSE OF WHICH IS NOT THE WINNING OF THE GAME.

MAYBE.

SOME evenin's I reach for my hat,
And down the steps I rush a-stumblin',
Like I was blind as any bat,
And growlin' all the way and grumblin'
Till you would laugh at me or you
Would sympathize some with me maybe.
But anyhow that's how I do
When my wife starts to spank the baby.

I know if I butt in at all
My wife will not be apt to thank me,
And still I hear my baby call
To me, "Please, dad, don't let her
'pank me!"
And I just have to rush outside
And down the street a-gallivantin',
And in my ears at every stride
My baby's pleadin' voice comes ha'nt-in'.

And sometimes I halfway turn back
At the remembrance of her pleadin',
Halfway worked up to fly the track,
Although I know the baby's needin'
A tender dingbat now and then,
When her wee feet go widely strayin',
When she has run away or when
She's mussed her clean dress up a-playin'.

But that don't make it easy none
For me when mother spanks the baby,
And I just grab my hat and run
And don't come back again till maybe
The babies are all tucked in bed,
All snuggled in and soundly sleepin',
With all their lay-mes softly said
And with an end to all their weepin'.

That baby is the cutest slip
And says the quaintest things, dog-gone it!
Sometimes when mamma says, "I'll whip!"
She says: "You tan't. I'm settin' on it!"
Now, after a reply like that
Who could watch baby get the paddle?
No wonder I reach for my hat
And don't look back as I skedaddle.

I like to think I'd hear the call
And go to war 'long with the quickest
And stand firm where the bullets fall
And where the slayin' blows fall thickest.
Maybe I would stand up and fight,
And I'd die facin' the foe maybe.
I think the bravest men take flight
When it gets time to spank the baby.

SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT ANALZED

Vicious—Says Ex-Attorney General George R. Caither.

Hon. George R. Gaither, former Attorney General, in an interview in the Baltimore News of Wednesday, gives strong reasons why he opposes the new Suffrage Amendment. He says:

"I am opposed to this proposed constitutional amendment limiting the suffrage for many reasons, but especially on account of the unreasonableness of the proposed limitations upon the suffrage, the creation forever of a favored class of voters and the disfranchisement of many thousands of the descendants of foreign-born parents, who now constitute some of our best citizens.

"The framers of this proposed amendment have required every person who is not exempted by inheritance from the requirement in his own handwriting with pen and ink, and without any aid, suggestion or memorandum whatsoever, and without any question or direction addressed to him by any of the officers of registration, to make application to register, correctly stating in such application his name, age, date and place of birth, residence and occupation at the time and for the next two years preceding, the name or names of his employer or employers, if any, at the time and for the two years next preceding, and whether he has previously voted, and if so, the State, county or city and district or precinct in which he voted last, and also the name in full of the President of the United States, of the Governor of Maryland, of one of the Judges of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, and of the Mayor of Baltimore City, if the applicant resides in Baltimore City, or of one of the County Commissioners of the county in which the applicant resides.

"The form of this proposed amendment was adopted by its framers from the Louisiana Constitution, which is the most extreme of any of the Southern States, and yet in Maryland they left out the most essential feature of the fairness in the Louisiana plan—namely, that the form of the application shall be submitted to the voter, and that the applicat shall simply fill up the blank spaces for names; dates and numbers in the form. The form of the application as set forth in the Louisana Constitution is as follows:

I am a citizen of the State of Louisiana. My name is.... I was born in the State (or county) of.... Parish (or county) of...., on the....day of.... in the year.... I am now ...years, ... months and .... days of age. I have resided in this Seate since ....., in the Parish since .... and in Precinct No. .... of Ward No. ..... of this Parish, since .... and I am not disfranchised by any provisions of the Constitution of this State.

"What can be said of the fairness of our Maryland law in comparison with the Louisiana stipulation? And yet the negro population of that state is almost equal to the white, although in Maryland they do not constitute over one-sixth of the population. Instead of a form which might direct the intelligent voter to determine what his answers should be, this Maryland amendment requires the applicant for registration to act without any question or direction addressed to him by any of the officers of registration. Such a provision, if fairly applied to all the voters of this State, both white and black, would, I am confident, disfranchise nine-tenths of the voters of this State. It may safely be assumed, therefore, that under its provisions all foreign-born citizens in the future will be unable to acquire the franchise.

"But this amendment will not only limit the enlargement of the electorate in this State by the addition of new citizens, but it will strike down the right to vote of many thousands of our citizens who are descended from foreign parents. The immigrants who came to this country in such large numbers from Ireland and Germany from 1850 to 1869 have developed a sturdy stock of American descendadts who are thoroughly imbued with the institutions of our land and are among our most patriotic citizens. The descendants of these men, although they have been born in this country and are just as much citizens of the United States as I am, would be forever disfranchised under this law; unless their parents were naturalized either before 1869 or after that time. It is well known that many thousands of our foreignborn population in all parts of the United States have either refused to be naturalized on account of a lingering affection for the old country or have died without becoming citizens. The descendants of any foreign born parents who failed to be naturalized before his death, even though those descendants were born in America, would be barred from any privilege of registration without this absurd examination unless they were born in this country prior to January 2, 1848. This is plain from the provisions of the proposed amendment. The persons entitled to vote are a person who on the first day of January, in the year 1869, or prior thereto, was entitled to vote under the laws of this State, or of any other State of the United States wherein he then resided, or a male descendant of such mentioned person.

"The laws of our State, in 1869, and in all the States of the United States that I know of, require that the person who is entitled to vote shall be at least 21 years of age. It is plain, therefore, that any descendants of a foreign-born parent who failed to be naturalized who were themselves under 21 years of age on January 1, 1869, would not come under the privilege of exemption. The only other exemption is as to 'foreign-born citizens of the United States naturalized between the first day of January, 1869, and the date of the adoption of this amendment, or a male descendant of such last mentioned person.' It is plain that under this provision any descendant of a foreign-born parent who failed to be naturalized during this period would also be disfranchised forever from exercising the franchise, unless he could pass the prohibitory requirment of the new amendment. Moreover, the mere fact of a proposed voter declaring himself to be descended from foreign-born parents would raise the presumption against his right to register, unless he is willing to swear from 'information and belief that he was a descendant of a person who was entitled to vote under these exemptions. Surely there is no emergency in Maryland which requires such a wholesale attack upon the rights of franchise of American citizens born in this country, whose right to vote may be destroyed or imperiled by the arbitrary amendment.

"There are many other reasons which in my judgment render this proposed attack upon the suffrage most unjustifiable. It is a sad day for our institutions when the right to vote is made a matter of inheritance and privilege, rather than of equal rights and a common interest in our country's welfare. Only fear of the gravest danger to our community would justify such a backward step. I have lived in Maryland all my life, and have been a student of its affairs and an earnest well-wisher for its futnre. I have never observed the slightest menace to the cause of good government, or to the permanent welfare of our people, in the votes of any class or race of our citizens, and I can therefore see no justification for this radical and unprecedented change."

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Hon. Philip Willett will deliver a lecture in the M. E. church to-morrow evening under the auspices of the "Invincibles," to which a general and cordial invitation is extended to everybody in the neighborhood. Mr. Willett has been in the lecture field for a number of years and stands very high as an entertainer.

Among the cottages rented since our last report we note the Baumgardner and J. H. Cuppett cottages on G street, the Garthright and Rembold cottages on H street, and the Walton Home and the Rev. Enlow cottage on F street.

Miss Ettie Springer is here and will conduct a boarding house on the corner of F. and Cedar streets.

The Misses Hamill have leased the Walton Home and are now putting it in order as a summer boarding house.

Mrs. Busselle and her daughters, Mrs. Hutchinson and Miss Mertie Finnell, of Parkersburg, W. Va., arrived Saturday evening and are occupying the Davis cottage.

Mr. J. L. Echard won't hardly notice ordinary folks—it's a boy, and a fine specimen, too.

'Esquire John R. Kerfoot is extremely ill and will likely survive but a few days.

B. F. Crane, Esq., and family are occupying the Queenwood hotel and Mr. Lloyd Crane and family are in the Alleghany House.

Mr. and Mrs. Harmison are here putting Romney cottage in order for the season.

Miss Percey Brady has been engaged by Dr. Davis as stenographer. Miss Brady gave entire satisfaction in the same position last year.

Dr. and Mrs. Campbell and daughter Miss Gertie are at home in Braethorn cottage.

Mr. C. W. Hopkins will be general manager of the Columbian Hotel again this season.

Rev. J. O. Bolton went to Wheeling early last week and remained over Sunday with his wife who is rapidly recovering from a severe surgical operation. Rev. Bolton will preach here at 3.30 Sunday afternoon.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. Daniel Beckman, superintendent of the Chaffee Coal Co., and a well known business man in the Elk Garden region, is dead at his home at Chaffee. He was taken sick with a bad cold on last Monday, which rapidly developed into pneumonia with fatal results. He was about 45 years old and was connected with one of the oldest and best known families in Garrett county. He leaves a widow and five children. Two of his daughters, being away from home at school, were summoned to his bedside and arrived a few hours before his death.

Postmaster Stump, who has been attending the Grand Lodge of the I. O. of R. M., which has been in session at Annapolis the last three days, returned home Saturday morning.

It is currently reported among the employes of the Dubois & Bond Bros. that the company will cease to manufacture lumber about August or September, on account of the timber supply being exhausted.

The company has been in operation at its present location about five or six years and during that time has furnished employment to about 150 men. The closing down of this industry will be quite a loss to the county in the way of taxes and a much greater loss to the little town of Bond, and the surrounding community, where $6,000 to $8,000 were distributed monthly in wages.

When active operations cease at Bond, many of the old employes will move to Alexander, W. Va., where they expect employment with the Croft Lumber Co., a new plant just starting up and under the management of Mr. N. U. Bond.

Mrs. John Raley was in Cumberland on Saturday shopping.

Magistrate Marcus M. Fazenbaker, of District No. 4, who resides in the Firm Rock settlement, was in town on legal business on Friday.

Mr. Joseph Tibbetts, of Beryl, who underwent an operation for appendicitis at St. Joseph's hospital, Baltimore, three weeks ago, arrived home on Friday afternoon. Joe is looking well and improving rapidly and expects to be strong enough in a few weeks to resume his active duties as pit boss of the group of mines on the Nob.

Mr. Frank Bush, of Roan, an employe of the Brown Lumber Co., was in town on business Saturday. He reports the company about through with their cut and expect to finish their business at the present location in July, after which they will move the mill to a point on the W. M. R. R., beyond Elkins, where an extensive tract of timber has been purchased.

Misses Mattie Kight and Anna Carl, of Keyser, and Miss Jennie Kight, of Cross, were guests of the Kemp family on Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Mullen, who were called to Gettysburg, a few weeks ago, on account of the death of a relative, returned home this week.

For "learning" is but wisdom's ghost,
And scorn, the boaster's price.

The first three days of May have been marked by wintery characteristics. Frost has been visiting this section and during each of the three days already past snow has fallen.

Mrs. K. A. Bittinger and Miss Myrtle Emory were shopping in Grantsville last Monday.

J. J. Bender, of Grantsville, loaded a car of maple sugar purchased from the camp owners in this section this week.

Mr. Cyrus Stark, of McHenry, was a business caller in this village one day last week.

Messrs. Charles Stark and George Moon, of this place, spent last week in search of employment in the lumber regions of West Virginia, but returned without having found desirable positions.

Cleaver Brenneman went over to Springs, Pa., last Monday morning to enter the employ of Messrs. Otto and Orendorf, lumber operators of that place.

Attorney Halbrook is making some improvements on his recently acquired property on the east side of Meadow mountain, near this place.

A party of young folks from this village, laden with parcels of good things for the larder, visited the cabin af Hannah Spiker, an old lady hermit, who lives alone on Meadow mountain, on last Sunday afternoon and made the old recluse's heart glad by the liberality of their donations and the cheering influence of their visit.

When you purchase a bottle of poison run a brass headed tack into the top of the cork. It serves as a marker, and children will be more cautious of the marked bottles. If the label comes off or is discolored the marker remains as a skull and crossbones warning.

Too Much Gravity a Bad Sign.

There is a false gravity which is a very ill symptom; and it may be said that as rivers which run very slowly have always the most mud at the bottom, so a solid stiffness in the constant course of a man's life is a sign of a thick bed of mud at the bottom of his brain.—Saville.

NOTICE TO TAXPAYERS!

This is to notify the tax payers of Garrett county that the Annual Levy for 1909 has been made and published, and to call their attention to the following abstract Section 45, Chapter 560, Acts of 1890, relating to the discount to be allowed and the interest to be charged on all tax bills.

"All county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of the levy thereof, and on all county taxes paid on or before the 1st day of September a discount of 3 per cent. will be allowed, and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. The Treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the tax bills for count purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt given for taxes so paid. But the discount shall not be allowed unless the whole amount of state and county are paid when same is made.

SHERIFF'S SALE OF Farming Land

Under and by virtue of a writ of fieri facias issued out of the Circuit Court for Garrett County at the suit of Phillip F. Smith vs. John W. Carroll et ux, to me directed and delivered and duly levied on the hereinafter described land, I, the undersigned Sheriff of Garrett County, have seized and taken in execution, and in front of the Post Office at Oakland, Garrett county in Maryland, at the hour of 4 o'clock P. M. on Saturday, the 29th Day of May,

1909, will offer at public sale to the highest bidder all the right and title and interest of the said John W. Carroll and wife in and to that tract of land in Garrett County, lying about one half mile west of Frankville, and embracing about twenty four acres and thirty perches, improved with some cherry, plum and apple trees;

Beginning at a stake standing on the East margin of the B. & O. R. R. Co. above Frankville station, and running thence South 40 degrees West, 40 perches to a stake and chestnut tree marked as pointers; South 21 degrees East, 106 perches to a chestnut and birch tree marked as pointers; North 40 degrees East, 40 perches to a stake with a hickory and ironwood tree marked as pointers; North 21 degrees West, 106 perches to the beginning. Being the same property inherited by said Carroll as sole child of Mary Sulser who obtained said land by deed from Joseph R. Anderson et al. August 31, 1883, recorded in Liber W. H. T., No. 8, folio 76, of the land records of Garrett county.

RENDERED UNCONSCIOUS FROM LIGHTNING'S FLASH

Wade Condron, of Swanton, Has a Narrow Escape With His Life.

While a party of young men and boys from Swanton were engaged in a game of baseball at the Steiding school house near Swanton last Saturday afternoon an electrical storm came up, when the players took refuge from the storm under a large oak tree near the ball grounds. While thus sheltered from the rain a bolt of lightning descended and struck the tree. The shock threw four of the ball players to the earth, none of them however, being seriously effected except Mr. Wade Condron who remained unconscious for more than an hour and a half, during which time his companions made every effort to estore him. Eventually he recovered and at the present time seems to suffer no ill effects as a result of his close call.

National Good Roads Congress.

To the Editor of The Republican:

This morning the undersigned received from the Governor of this State notification of his appointmeut to a "National Good Roads Congress" in Baltimore, Maryland, the 18th, 19th, 20th and 21st of the present month.

As similar notifications may reach many of our citizens will it not be helpful if you will this week more fully explain the purpose of such notification or appointments?

It may not be likely that the Garrett farmer or citizen will be able to add important support to the comtemplated proceedings, but that farmer or citizen will have, perhaps, the opportunity of his life to obtain the most advanced ideas ascertained by the best experience and wisdom known to this subject in the United States. If any part of such information can be gathered and brought home for dissemination it will help to bring the conduct and method of our road construction nearer abreast with those improvements today evolved from modern thought and practice.

C. M. MILLER.

Swanton, May 11, 1909.

Orphans' Court Proceedings.

The semi-monthly session of the Orphans' Court convened Tuesday when the following business was transacted:

Letters of administration were issued to C. J. Rathbun on the personal estate of C. M. Rathbun, late of Garrett county, deceased; to Samuel R. Harvey on the personal estate of Sampson Harvey, late of Garrett county, deceased; to Cloyd M. Crane on the personal estate of John C. Crane, late of Preston county, W. Va., deceased; to Francis E. Nichols on the personal estate of Capt. Thomas A. Maulsby, late of Marion county, W. Va., deceased.

SHEEP OWNERS HAVE RECOURSE

Sections of the Sheep Law of 1908, if Enforced, May Give Relief.

The recent publication in this paper of a news item stating that a number of sheep had been killed by dogs running at large, has raised the question of a more stringent sheep law for the county, many of the farmers and others interested in the sheep industry being under the impression that no protection was afforded the losers by the incursions of dogs among their flocks, when in fact a law was enacted at the last session of the Legislature affording protection to every owner in the county, provided the proper action is taken by the residents of any district and the matter is properly taken before the Board of County Commissioners.

For the benefit of the owners of sheep we publish below the law introduced in the Senate by Senator Brown on February 28th, 1908, which was later enacted:

It shall be lawful to kill any dog seen running sheep in Garrett County, and owners of dogs shall be liable for all sheep killed or injured by them, and any person seeing such dogs running at large may lawfully kill the same.

The Board of County Commissioners of Garrett County, upon the petition of taxpayers, if they select, shall have power to levy a tax or license fee upon dogs and bitches owned, kept, or harbored within their county, and to provide for the enrollment of said dogs and bitches, designating the officer or officers to do the same, and they may designate the time and manner of collecting the tax or license fee, and appoint the officer or officers to make such collection or enrollment, and may require them to give bond: and upon the petition in writing of the taxpayers of any one election district the County Commissioners, if they see fit, shall have power to levy an amount upon the taxable basis of the district so petitioning, which amount shall be applied in that district only to reimburse the owners of sheep or lambs residing in said district for all sheep or lambs injured or killed by dogs, at a flat rate of three dollars per head; provided, that this payment shall not be made when the ownership of the dog which did such killing can be proved. The County Commissioners are hereby authorized to make all rules and regulations covering the custody and disbursement of this special fund.

Injured in Runaway.

Lon Yammer and Jess Butler, two Garrett county farmers, were injured in a runaway while driving from Jennings to Lonaconing. They were driving a span of colts and the horses ran away throwing out both men. Yammer was unconscious when picked up. Both men were very much shaken up and the colts ran seven miles before they were stopped by George McIntyre.

UNIFORM RANK K. OF P. TO BE MUSTERED IN

Next Tuesday Night When About Two Hundred Visitors Will Be Present.

Garrett Division No. 9, Uniform Rank, Knights of Pythias, composed of thirty members of the local lodge, will be mustered in on next Tuesday evening, the 18th inst. by Lieut.-Col. Rusler, of Cumberland, at Knights of Pythias hall in Oakland.

The occasion promises to be a notable one for the members of the new division as they will have as their guests some two hundred and fifty visiting uniformed Knights, coming from Cumberland, Frostburg, Lonaconing, Piedmont, Keyser, Midland, Terra Alta, Friendsville and Grafton. From Cumberland two full companies are expected as well as the entire membership of the Terra Alta division, while the other points named will send delegations of Knights ranging in numbers from fifteen to thirty or forty.

The visitors will arrive in Oakland on train No. 55 from the east and on train No. 14 from the west. At the station they will be met by the local Knights and the City band who will escort them through the principal streets of the city.

The West Virginia Knights will be under command of Gen. W. B. Pack, of Parkersburg, who is Past Supreme Grand Chancellor of West Virginia, while the Marylanders will be commanded by Col. Rusler.

The mustering ceremonies will occur in the lodge room beginning at eight o'clock and will require considerable time.

It has been suggested that all members of the local lodge, whether they are members of the uniform division or not, be in Oakland on Tuesday to assist in welcoming the visitors and make their stay here as pleasant as possible.

The new division is officered as follows: Captain, Robert C. Townshend; First Lieutenant, Wade Hinebaugh; Second Lieutenant, D. E. Bolden; Recorder, W. H. Bartlett; Guards, William Lawton and Claude Brown; Treasurer, Austin Brown. Dr. Henry W McComas, who was captain of the old Uniform Rank when it flourished in Oakland a number of years ago, has been commissioned assistant surgeon on the General's staff.

Call for Your Letters.

Miss Kate Bach, Miss Rose Boyer, Miss Ruth Bryant, Mr. W. H. Hyde, Miss Bertha Miller, Mr. Howard Sonner, Mr. John H. Williams.

NATIONAL GOOD ROADS CONGRESS

A Large Number of Garrett Countians Appointed As Delegates.

The National Good Roads Congress, which has been organized a number of years will meet this year at Baltimore on May 18th and will continue until the 21st inst. with sessions to be held during each day and evening.

Governor Crothers of Maryland, who has taken great interest in road matters, especially in Maryland, has appointed a large number of delegates from each county in the State to attend the congress, those from Garrett county being Messrs. W. R. Sharpless, C. M. Miller, Clarence V. Guard, Frederick G. Fox, Uriah M. Stanton, Peter Nathan, Carroll Pattison, Jacob Stump, Fred. C. Ries, Henry Speciher, Hamill Casteel, William A. Smith, Henry Smouse, Chauncey Kimmell, James Mason, Frank W. Chase, Thomas B. Layman, Thomas J. Johnson, Sebastian Hinebaugh, Samuel P. Specht, Oscar Robeson, Richard E. Garlitz, James Bowser Silas C. Beachy, M. A. Browning, Lewis C. Hamill, Scott T. Jones, D. M. Dixon and Abel DeWitt.

The above named gentlemen have received notifications of their appointment as delegates, many of whom expect to attend the Congress.

Many Saloons Will Close.

Liquor dealers at Parkersburg are up in the air as the result of the action of council in raising the amount of license in Parkersburg from $600 to $1000 a year. This move was not expected by some of the saloon men, who are making arrangements to retire from business June 30, when their present licenses expire. The city now has about sixty-five saloons, and it is expected that many of the saloon keepers will not apply for license for the next year, as many figure that it will not justify them to pay a combined license of $2,000, the state license being $1,000 also.

Lectures at the Normal.

The students of the Oakland Normal school, as well as the residents of the town, will be treated to two lectures this week, provided they avail themselves of the opportunities thus presented. On Thursday afternoon at three o'clock Rev. W. H. Stowell, rector of the P. E. church, will address the students on a live subject. All interested are urged to be present. Then on Friday evening at eight o'clock in the school chapel Rev. Dr. W. W. Davis will deliver an illustrated stereopticon lecture on his travels through Europe. This lecture is well worth the hearing as it is instructive as well as entertaining. The admission to Dr. Davis' lecture will be free but those attending must present at the door cards, which may be procured at the Oakland Pharmacy.

CAMP MEETING AT MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK

Prominent Churchmen Will Be Present At the Gathering This Year.

The annual camp-meeting at Mountain Lake Park will be held this year from July 6th to 15th inclusive. Evangelist Jos. H. Smith, member of the Philadelphia M. E. Conference, and who has been heard in past years by the multitudes who gather at Mt. Lake Park, will be in charge of this year's meeting, assisted by an excellent corps of ministers and evangelists, among whom may be mentioned Rev. C. J. Fowler, president of the National Holiness Association; Rev. H. C. Morrison, editor of the Pentecostal Herald: Rev. C. F. Oliver; Evangelists Aura Smith and Edwin L. Hyde. Dr. Gilmour will have charge of the music.

There is some prospect that Bishop Luther Wilson may be able to arrange his work so as to be present for a day or so.

The expectations of those in charge of the work is that this year's meetings will mark a decided forward movement and that the influence from Mountain Lake camp-meeting for 1909 will extend beyond its usual extensive boundaries.

The non-sectarian and inter-denominational features which have heretofore governed this meeting will also be a feature of the great Pentecostal gathering for 1909.

Oakland Normal.

The Oakland Normal School is making an effort and is achieving great success under a splendid faculty. The enrollment has increased steadily until we now have about eighty. Prof. Palmer teaches arithmetic, mental, geography, physiology and English history. Prof. DeWitt has charge of algebra, geometry, grammar, general history and United States history. About one-fifth of the number are old teachers and a great many are high school studenet.

An interesting part of the work is the afternoon lectures which will be delivered this week on Thursday afternoon instead of on Friday, as usual.

Prof. Matthews, of Cambridge, delivered a series of lectures last week upon "Birds and Flowers," which were interesting and instructive.

It is doubtful if the citizens of Oakland will ever have the opportunity of hearing such a man again. It is a deplorable fact that the people of our town prefer to see and hear maudlin circuses and performing monkeys rather than a scientist's lectures.

BOARD OF TRADE REORGANIZED

Mr. D. M. Dixon Made President and Mr. Samuel Lawton Secretary.

The recently elected board of directors of the Oakland Board of Trade met Tuesday evening for the purpose of selecting officers of the Board for the ensuing year. All members of the directors' board with the exception of Mr. D. E. Offutt, Jr., who was absent from town, participated in the selection of officers and other matters coming before the board for discussion.

The board organized by electing Mr. D. M. Dixon president; Mr. D. M. Mason vice-president, Mr. Samuel Lawton, secretary, and Mr. Joseph E. Harned, treasurer.

Under the bylaws the President will name members of the various committees authorized by the orginization's bylaws and they will be announced at a special meeting of the board to be called for a future day.

Matters which may eventually add materially to the commercial welfare of Oakland and Garrett county were discussed by the directors, several plans being set on foot to interest outside captal in a number of contemplated industries to be established here.

A Royal Good Time at Deer Park.

Saturday, the 29th inst., in the morning, and continuing all day, the veterans of the War of the Rebeilion will celebrate Decoration Day at Deer Park. A right royal welcome is extended to the good people of Garrett county to spend the 29th in one of the nicest places in the State of Maryland. The Governor of the State will be invited to be present. Ex-Confederates will be there and the Deer Park Cornet band, and a large choir of Deer Park girls will sing. All this at Deer Park on Saturday, May 29th.

The Late W. W. Sweet.

Mr. Wm. W. Sweet, of our village, passed to his reward May 4. He was in his 57th year. The funeral services were conducted in the Methodist Episcopal church on the evening of May 7. The burial was conducted by the Red Men. The very large crowd present showed the high esteem in which he was held.

Mr. Sweet was born at Bergin Point New Jersey. He held the offices of Supervisor and Commonwealth Attorney in the State of New York. He moved to Swanton about fourteen years ago and held the position of agent for the B. & O. R. R. for several years, but in later years he has been post master here. Mr. Sweet was a member of the Methodist church and will be greatly missed as he was a very earnest worker. He leaves a wife and three sons to mourn his loss.

DIXON & KELSO

WOOL!

DIXON & KELSO will be in a position to pay the HIGHEST MARKET PRICE FOR WOOL either Cash or Trade. The price is starting out 6 to 7 cents per pound better than last year.

We also have 3 tons special feed for small chickens, which we can sell at a price very little higher than meal.

Yours to Please. DIXON & KELSO.

H. C. SINCELL, THE FAMILY OUTFITTER

When a man invests his money in Clothing he usually looks for the best he can procure for his money. While it is wise economy to buy everything of the best you can make no mistake in buying such Clothes as Hart, Shaffner & Marx, or the Collegian kind. While these are the best Clothes, they do not cost any more than the ordinary kind you buy in other stores. This season we are showing a stronger line than ever before, embracing all the new shades of Green as well as the standard Blue and Black, made in twenty different models.

THE SUNSHINE SUITS for Women have given satisfaction for 10 years, and this season they are far in advance of any we have ever before shown. We have many suits the same style as this cut at $12.

We show every imageable color and style of Hat for Men and Boys at prices from 50 cents to $3.00.

Our store was never so attractive as now. Every department is well stocked with the new and stylish wearing apparel for Men, Women and Children.

We show every imaginable color and style Hat for Men and Boys, at prices from 50 cents to $3.00.

We would be pleased at any time to show you through this enormous stock of Clothing, and at the same time make you acquainted with the new styles that will be worn for the coming season.

We are agents for Queen Quality Shoes for Women.
We are agents for Educator Shoes for Children.
We are agents for Bion Shoes for Men.
We are agents for All America Shoes for Men.
We are agents for Hart, Shaffner & Marx Clothing for Men.

To pay this amount it was ascertained that the taxable property as shown by the assessment books amounts to $8,491,012, which at $1.02 on the $100, will make the above amount for county purposes; $86,608.32.

Deducting $728,314 for Corporations paying direct to the State Treasurer, leaves the basis $7,762,698 at 16 cents on each $100, makes $12,420.32, and this added make the taxes for state and county purposes $99,028.64.

MAKE IT BRIGHT.

Has Your Stable Enough Windows to Let Sunlight In.

Once more we raise the question: Has your stable enough sunlight?

Take a row of windows as high as the ceiling of your cow stable, occupying at least one third of the space. You do not need a carpenter to do that; you can do it yourself. You can make the windows small, one pane of sash 12x24 or 13x26 inches, and have them so that they will slide backward if necessary, and over that space in the summer time you can put netting or even cheese cloth, which will let in the air and keep out the flies, affording you a comfortable place to milk the cows in the hot weather. If we cannot induce you to go to the expense of making sash, make the openings anyhow and cover them over with duck this winter. That will let in the sunlight and at the same time help provide ventilation. Get the sunlight into your stables anyhow, if you want to ward off tuberculosis, have healthy cows and healthy calves, and get the worth of your feed.

DAIRY NOTES.

Plenty of sunlight in the cow stable means healthy animals.

It is best to raise your own dairy cows if you can possibly do so. Then you know what you have.

It requires grain as well as roughness to produce butter fat, and butter fat at present prices is what pays.

Oil meal contains 32 per cent. protein, consequently it is good for milch cows, but should not be fed too liberally.

A quart of milk, by actual chemical analysis, is said to possess as much nutritive value as a pound of beefsteak.

Milk at a stated hour both morning and evening and keep everything about the stable and the dairy clean and fresh.

You should not only know how much each cow produces, but how much it costs to do the producing.

Don't Sell Them.

The man who sells the heifer calver from his best cows is depriving himself of good dairy cows in the time to come when dairy cows will be in greater demand at higher prices than at present.

Anise-Zweibach.

Beat whites of five eggs, add yolks, one-half pound sugar; stir 20 minutes (some direction always) to a cream. Add one heaping tabelspoon of anise seed and half a pound of flour. Stir together awhile. Bake in long, narrow tin, rounded bottom if possible, in moderate heat for about 20 minutes. When partly cooled cut in slices of three-quarters of an inch each and brown in oven.

To Clean Light Wool Skirt.

To clean light wool skirt take one pail of warm soft water. To this add one pint of gasoline and one-quarter bar of naphtha soap (dissolved). Put the skirt to be washed into this and wash carefully. Rinse in water the same temperature as water used in washing skirt. This is an excellent method and never fails to make skirt look like new.

Making the Clothesline Last.

The housekeeper who believes in saving in little things always boils her clothesline for about 15 minutes before using it the first time. It is put on in cold water and slowly brought to a boil. Stretch the rope to dry so it does not twist.

RAILROAD MEN AND DRINK.

Move Towards Total Abstinence Has Been Steady.

The temperance movement in United States proceeds by fits and starts, but in one particular field the progress of real temperance—habits of self-control—has been constant. That field is modern industry, and especially the railroad business. The most important step in the control of habit in relation to drink had its real beginning in the railroad business. It has now been many years since the Pennsylvania railroad informed its employes that a worker should not use alcoholic stimulants while on duty, and it is well known that neither an engineer nor any other member of the operating force of a railroad will now long retain his position if he drinks when not on duty. Nor is that all. It is extremely difficult to obtain employment in the first instance on either the Pennsylvania or the Reading or on any other important railroad in the United States if the applicant is a drinking man. The fact that a man receives an appointment on a railroad raises a strong presumption that he is sober, temperate, or an abstainer; the retention of his position is pretty good evidence as to his habits. Employes have long since learned that the price of retaining a position on a railroad is temperance, and the railroads exercise more and more care in that direction. The steady pressure from this source, says the Saturday Public Ledger, has been one of the great influences against intemperate habits. The work thus begun by the railroads has been extended to great varieties of industry and trade, which, under the stress of modern competition, demand the kind of efficiency that positively forbids the immoderate use of liquor or any excesses or habits calculated to impair the intellectual and physical energy of the workers. This pressure exerted by business is one of the brightest aspects of the high degree of tension in our eager, aggressive and exhausting life.

A FATAL DISEASE.

Strong Medical Opinion on the Inebriety Problem.

The Mississippi Valley Medical association concluded its annual convention at Louisville, Ky., recently. An interesting paper on the final session was that of Dr. T. D. Crothers, superintendent of the Walnut Le hospital, at Hartford, and one of most distinguished medical experts in America.

The doctor contended that inebriety was a far more fatal disease than consumption, and was more widely spread. The so-called moderate use of spirits, by diminishing the vitality and lowering the resisting power of nature, he said, was an active cause of consumption and typhoid fever, and was accountable for over 80 per cent. of all cases of pneumonia. In fact, there was no disease known and no surgical operation performed that was not influenced and made worse by spirits. The whole alcoholic problem, he continued, was a physical one, the result of disease, controlled by laws which move with the same exactness and certainty as any other operation in nature.

The present efforts of laymen and societies to correct and prevent this evil as a moral one, he stated, was a sad reflection on the stupidity of the medical profession. They are particularly trained to understand the phenomena and the import of the alcoholic problem, and yet as a class they have practically ignored it and left the subject to enthusiastic reformers, with equal propriety and sense. The medical profession in the near future will be the teachers and leaders of the campaign against alcohol. There is something, he stated, in the absurdity of reform movements without the aid of a physician or without his leadership. It is still more startling to assume that the terrible evils from alcohol are to be explained as moral lapses and may be cured by merely moral means.

Temperance Progress in the Indian Army.

The annual meeting of the governing council of the Royal Army Temperance association was held lately at the army headquarterrs, Simla, under the presidency of Lord Kitchener. The report for the year was considered to be most satisfactory. The increase of membership was 2,350. This was considered to be in part due to the assistance which the association gives its members to find employment when they return to civil life, to the class of young soldiers coming out to India, and also to the spirit in which the organization of the association is carried on. It is estimated that over 40 per cent. of the British troops in India are total abstainers. This is a good record, but from even the low standpoint of military efficiency it would be vastly better if the whole army were enrolled in the total abstinence ranks.

Reform in China.

The International Reform bureau opened its great anti-opium conference in Shanghai on January 1, 1909. Rev. E. W. Thwing toured the country for the bureau, addressing the people in their own language and distributing millions of pamphlets and tracts.

UNWISE FOR EMIGRANTS TO MASS IN COUNTRY SAYS ROOSEVELT

Discusses Japanese Situation as It Affects Western States in Able Editorial in Outlook.

In the current number of the Outlook, editor Theodore Roosevelt discusses the Japanese situation as it affects the Western states. His editorial in part follows:

"There are certain elementary principles, all of which should be kept in view if a nation wishes to act justly both by itself and others. It must insist upon what is necessary for its own healthy life, and this even at the cost of a possible clash. But this insistence upon what is due to itself should always be accompanied by all possible courtesy to and fair dealing with others.

"These are the principles upon which the people of the United States should act as regards the question of immigration of the Japanese into this country. The Japanese are a highly civilized people, of extraordinary military, artistic and industrial development; they are proud, warlike and sensitive. Believe that our people have, what I personally certainly have, a profound and hearty admiration for them. But this admiration and respect is accomplished by a firm conviction that it is not for the advantage of either people that emigrates from either country should settle in mass in the other country. * * * *

"Japan would certainly object to the incoming of masses of American farmers, laborers and small traders. Indeed, the Japanese would object to this at least as strongly as the men on the Pacific coast and Rocky mountains object to the incoming masses of Japanese workmen, agricultural labor and men engaged in small trade. The Japanese certainly object to Americans acquiring land in Japan at least as much as the Americans of the far western states object to the Japanese acquiring land on our soil. The Americans who go to Japan and the Japanese who come to America should be be of the same general class—that is, they should be travelers, students, teachers, scientific investigators, men engaged in international business, men sojourning in the land for pleasure and study. * * * *

"It is against the interest of both nations that such unrestricted emigration or settlement in mass should be allowed as regards either nation. This is the cardinal of the act in the situation: it should be recognized by both countries, * * * *

"But in achieving this policy we should bear steadily in mind that it is our duty to combine the maximum of efficiency with the minimum or offensiveness. Only the national government can carry out such a policy effectively, and the surest way to do harm is for the state, municipal or other local government to pass laws which would be ineffective to obtain the real object and yet would produce intense irritation. The best of all possible ways to achieve the object is that which the governments of the two countries have now by common agreements adopted for the Japanese government has of its own initiative and of it own accord undertaken to prevent the coming hither in any appreciable number of Japanese of the classes to which I have referred. * * * *

"The success of the policy must be gauged by its actual results; that is by the extent to which it arrests the immigration of large bodies of Japanese. If the Japanese government proves unable to carry its policy through, then undoubtedly this government by treaty or legislation must protect itself and secure the desired result on its own initiative. But in such a case it would be doubly incumbent upon us to take the action that would provoke the least possible friction and cause the least possible hard feeling. * * * *

"The fact that all really patriotic and far-sighted Americans insist that hand in hand with a policy of upbuilding our own navy is often interpeted by the well meaning but short sighted as being a threat towards other nations or as being provocative of war. Of the two assumptions the first is utterly unwarranted and the second the direct reverse of the truth. We have the right to say, for instance, what immigrants shall come to our shores but we are powerless to enforce this right against any nation that chooses to disregard our wishes, unless we continue to build up and maintain a first-class fighting navy.

"We Americans are ourselves proud and high spirited, and we are not always by any means farsighted. If our honor or our interests were menaced by a foreign power, this nation would fight, wholly without regard to whether or not its navy was efficient. In the event of a crisis arriving the peace advocates who object to our building up the navy would be absolutely powerless to prevent this country going to war. A strong navy is the surest guarantee of peace that America can have and the cheapest insurance against war that Uncle Sam can possibly have.

"THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

AN IMPORTANT DECISION.

Under the Hepburn railroad rate law, common carriers were prohibited from transporting a commodity, other than lumber, in which they had "any interest, direct or indirect." In a test case tried before the circuit court for the 3d Federal District, the act was declared unconstitional on the ground that it violated the Federal Constitution by depriving the roads of their property without due process of law. The Supreme Court in a decision rendered this week reversed the lower court and decided that ownership of stock by common carriers in companies whose products they transport (coal mines for instance) does not constitute a "legal interest" within the meaning of the law. While the decision is not very clear to the lay mind it appears to decide that while Congress has power to enact legislation to prevent railroads from owning stock its intention was not made clear in the law under consideration. What further action Congress will take remains to be seen. The evil of favoritism in rates and car supply to companies controlled by the railroads are against independent shippers has practically been cured. But the railroads stopped such abuses because of the action of Congress. The intention of Congress was clearly right has been upheld, the law should be enacted in language that will meet the objections stated by the court.

Improvement of Dirt Roads.

The Maryland Motorist acknowledges its indebtedness to Mr. Donald McCaskey, chief of the Publicity Bureau of the Lancaster (Pa.) Club, for a very timely suggestion anent good roads. The plan of operation could well be adopted thoughout Maryland to the betterment of the condition of its dirt roads. In dry weather good dirt roads offer as good a surface for motoring as does any, with the greater advantage of passing, as a rule, through sections more rural and picturesque than can be found on the regular roads of through travel.

The Lancaster plan is to interest the road supervisors of the different districts, and through them to secure permission to drag a one mile stretch of dirt roadway with a King Split Road Drag for a period of twenty hours of labor all told, the dragging being done after each rain by farmers who live at convenient localities. The Automobile Club supplies the road drag, pays the farmer who drags the road, and agrees to make good, by a $500 bond if necessary, that no damage will be done to the roadway. At each section of the county a newspaper is given the credit of conducting the experiment, and the news columns of the nearest paper are kept alive with frequent reports regarding the condition of the road from time to time, demonstrations held upon it, officials present, comparisons made with stretches of road not dragged. Newspaper correspondence is solicited from the farmers living in the neighborhood of the demonstration and who are afforded every opportunity to drive over the newly dragged road and examine its condition. Lancaster county through this method is becoming a beehive of road industry, and the progressive plan of the Lancaster Automobile Club gives every evidence of being the right remedy for good roads now, which is the campaign slogan of the club.—From Maryland Motorist of May.

ABOUT PLANTING POTATOES.

The United States Department of Agriculture, after exhaustive experiments in potato planting, has given out the opinion that, in season, one time is as good as an other to put potatoes in the ground.

There is a wide-spread belief that, in order to be successful in raising a good crop of potatoes, the tubers must be planted in the dark of the moon. The field workers of the Department of Agriculture have been investigating the matter, and have found that seventy-five per cent. of the farmers of this country put in their crops and do a good many other things about the farm governed solely by the moon's phases. Many farmers will tell you that if you plant potatoes in the dark of the moon they will run to tubers, and if in the light of the moon they will run to tops, and crops are planted accordingly.

There is usually a basis in fact for any superstition; and the moon theory was found to be so deeply rooted that a number of experts from the Department of Agriculture while going up and down and across the land, have made it their business to study the question thoroughly and see whether there might not be a germ of truth, or, at the reason for the almost general belief that the moon's phase have an effect on animal and vegetable life. They have concluded, they say, of patient investigation, that the moon "superstition, is one of the comparatively few "myths" that date back to pure savagery, and absolutely not an atom of scientific foundation on which to stand. The agricultural experiment stations all over the country have been defying this so-called "notion" for several years, they say, and raising just as good crops when the moon was one way as when it was the other. Therefore, once and for all, it is conclusively decided, officially, that there is nothing to the theory that potatoes should be planted in the dark of the moon.

Nevertheless there are many people who will continue to be guided by the signs of the moon, being convinced by experience that it is safest to do so.

PAUL AT ICONIUM AND LYSTRA

Sunday School Lesson for May 16, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 14:1-28. Memory verses 21, 22.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"All the gods of the nations are idols; but the Lord made the heavens."—Psalm 96:5.

TIME.—Immediately after the last lesson. Perhaps in the autumn of A. D. 47.

PLACE.—Lycaonia, in southern Galatia. Iconium, Lystra, Derbe, with a return to Antioch and Perga, and thence to Antioch in Syria.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

The greater the work a man endeavors to do, the greater the obstacles that he will meet, and the more numerous they will be. It is a principle of physics that resistance increases as the square of the velocity. Paul's work, like that of all true Christians, was very great, and therefore it encountered formidable obstacles.

But these hindrances were overcome, in Christ's strength; and the process of overcoming them strengthened Paul, as it will strengthen us. "A certain amount of opposition is a great help to a man. Kites rise against and not with the wind. Even a head wind is better than none."—John Neal.

"A great multitude both of the Jews and also of the Greeks (Jewish proselytes) believed;" but there were "unbelieving Jews" (R. V. "disobedient" to the truth), who prejudiced the Gentile populace against the missionaries by their calumnies. For this double reason ("therefore," v. 3) Paul and Barnabas remained at Iconium a "long time," probably several months, since (1) there were so many converts to be instructed in their new faith, and (2) that faith was evidently to be tried by severe opposition and would need to be strongly re-enforced by instruction. Finally, however, the hatred of the Jewish rulers and of the Gentiles whom they influenced (not the Gentile rulers, see v. 5) became so inflamed with the missionaries' bold speech and increasing success that a plot was formed to stone them as blasphemers. Getting knowledge of this, and mindful of Christ's command (Matt. 10:23) to flee from persecution, Paul and Barnabas escaped, going first to "Lystra," 18 miles south-southwest of Iconium, and then to the Derbe, 20 miles to the southeast of Lystra.

Stories of the gods coming down to man were common among the Greeks and other races. "Like distorted and obscure reflections in muddy water, they give a blurred image of the great truth."—Maclaren. They show that Christ's coming was in response to a universal need. One of these tales was of the visit of Jupiter and Mercury to this very Lycaonia. The people thought them to be poor vagrants, refused to entertain them, ridiculed and maltreated them. At last they came to the hut of the poor peasants, Baucis and Philemon, who received them hospitably and entertained them with the best they had. In return, the gods transformed their hut into a glorious temple over which they were set as the chief ministers of worship, while the churlish neighbors were punished by a terrible flood which overwhelmed them. The statue of Jupiter stood before the gate of Lystra, and Ewald suggests that this story of Baucis and Philemon may have been recited year by year at the great festival in this temple.

They "persuaded the people." "Probably they influenced the multitudes to regard the miracle, the reality of which they could not dispute, as the work not of beneficent gods, but of evil demons."—Expos. Greek Testament. They raised a mob, which "stoned Paul," whose bold speech had centered hostility upon himself. What memories of the stoning of Stephen ten or eleven years before must have passed through Paul's mind! "Transformed into a howling mob, like those which even in Christian America shoot negroes, Chinamen and Italians, the quondam worshipers left Paul ready, as they supposed, for the cremation fires or the vagrant dogs."—William Elliot Griffs, L. H. D. Perhaps, as the stoning of Stephen must have moved Paul toward Christianity, the stoning of Paul was the turning point in the life of Timothy. The young man may have been among "the disciples who stood round about him," to give what aid they could, and care for his body if he were really dead.

Note the sudden change in the feelings of the people toward Paul, and compare it with the revolution in the attitude of the people of Jerusalem toward Christ, from "Hosanna!" to "Crucify him!" Compare also the sudden change in the minds of the people of Malta, Acts 28:4-6. The lesson is "not to rate very highly human praise; not to be greatly depressed by human censure. Had Paul been desperately anxious to please Lystra, I fancy that that stoning would have killed him."—Morrison.

How did the missionaries close the first missionary journey? Properly and wisely, with a report to the home church at Antioch in Syria, which had sent them forth.

This report was to the whole church, for all had a part in the work, and needed the stimulus of the report. Every member of the congregation should be in the missionary meeting. (2) It was a modest report, telling what "God had done with them," on their side, as an ally, and not recounting the achievements as their own. (3) It was an encouraging report, a report of progress, telling of the great forward step that had been taken, the admission of Gentiles into the church through "the door of faith," and no longer through the rite of circumcision.

Present Condition of Country's Forest Resources.

Few people have anything like a clear idea of the amount of forest wealth left in this country. Those who think at all about this natural resource which has assisted in material development since the landing of the first settlers, are usually too much influenced by the condition of that particular State or section in which they are most familiar.

If they live in a much deforested or a treeless region, the people usually imagine that the country's timber supply is even more limited than is actually the fact. On the other hand, with those whose homes are located in a section where a pinch in timber has not been experienced, the feeling is likely to be altogether the other way, and some become so indifferent at times as to think that there is really not much reason to worry about a timber problem. Both can profit by a reading of the actual facts.

The forests of the United States now cover about 550 million acres, or about one-fourth of the land of the whole country. The original forests covered not less than 850 million acres, or nearly one-half.

The forests owned by the government covers one-fourth of the total forest area, and contains one-fifth of all timber standing. Forests privately owned cover three-fourths of the area, and contain four-fifths of the standing timber. Besides having three times the area and four times the forests, the timberland privately owned is generally more valuable.

Forestry, or conservative lumbering, is practiced on 70 per cent. of the forests publicly owned and on less than 1 per cent. of the forests privately owned. This covers the country's forest resources as they stand to-day. Senator Smoot, Chairman of the Section of Forests of the National Convention Commission, in outlining the future has said:

"By reasonable thrift we can produce a constant timber supply beyond our present need and with it conserve the usefulness of our streams for irrigation, water supply, navigation, and power.

"Under right management our forests will yield over four times as much as now. We can reduce waste in the woods and in the mill at least one-third, with present as well as future profit. We can perpetuate the naval stores industry. Preservative treatment will reduce by one-fifth the quantity of timber used in the water or in the ground.

"We can practically stop forest fires at a total yearly cost of one-fifth the value of the standing timber burned each year, not counting young growth.

"We shall suffer for timber to meet our needs until our forests have had time to grow again. But if we act vigorously and at once, we shall escape permanent timber scarcity."

Boundary Line Case.

Attorney General Straus appeared before the United States Supreme Court yesterday with a request that it set a date at the October term for hearing the case of the disputed boundary between Maryland and West Virginia. The controversy has been pending for over a quarter of a century. About 46 square miles are in dispute. The chief point to be settled is, which is the fountain of the Potomac River? Marylanders claim one fountain head and West Virginians another. The fountain head of the Potomac was defined in Lord Baltimore's Charter as the western boundary of his province.

State Roads Work to Start.

Contracts will be let this year by the State Roads Commission for 137 miles of thoroughfares in the 23 counties of Maryland, ranging from six to eight miles in each, except Baltimore county, in which contracts will be let for 14 miles. This was decided Monday. Friday has been fixed as the day of the next meeting of the State Roads Commission. The Commissioners will meet again on the following Thursday to ask for bids on roads in Prince George's, Anne Arrundel, Allegany and Garrett counties, for which surveys and plats are nearing completion.

MR. WILLIAM F. STONE'S ANSWER

Clear and Forceful Discussion of the Amendment in Reply to Democratic Challange.

Collector of Customs, William F. Stone, Republican leader of the fight against the disfranchising amendment, last week sent an answer to the challenge for a joint debate on the merits of the Straus amendment issued by Mr. B. B. Shreeves, Chairman of the Democratic City Committee. The Collector declines to go upon the platform with Mr. Shreeves, stating that he is not a debater or speechmaker, and characterizes the letter of the Democratic Chairman as offensive. Mr. Stone's letter is as follows:

"SIR: I do not think that the tenor of your letter of a few days ago—the full text of which the newspapers did not publish—entitles it to the courtesy of a reply. Its offensive terms may be attributed to the excess of zeal that so often characterizes the convert.

"Your so-called challenge, embodied in the letter, is unique in that you not only do the challenging, but insist upon choosing the weapons. You limit it to one phase of the obnoxious and dangerous amendment, and seek to ignore some of its most serious aspects and consequences.

"The independent press and citizens oppose it for many patent reasons.

"It would make Maryland a one-party state. To you as Chairman of the Democratic City Committee this may not appear to be an objection, but on the contrary a desirable object. The disinterested and patriotic citizens of this state look upon the matter differently, and are unwilling to surrender their control of the government of the state and city to one party. That the adoption of the amendment would make Maryland a one-party state has been demonstrated during the course of the amendment campaign, and is conceded by all disinterested thinkers on the subject. This in itself is sufficient to condemn it as vicious legislation, antagonistic to the public welfare.

"There is, moreover, no race issue in Maryland. No one free from prejudice and unaffected by partisan or personal interest can seriously believe for a moment that there is a race issue in this state. The colored population is only a small percentage of the whole population, and this percentage has steadily declined instead of increasing. If the only excuse for the adoption of any amendment has no foundation for it in fact, the natural inference to be drawn is, that the real reason is to obtain a party advantage by making Maryland a one-party state.

"Furthermore, in the opinion of President Taft and of the leading lawyers of the state, the amendment is clearly in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. As a state official and a member of the bar, who, in both capacities has sworn to uphold the constitution of the United States, this phase of the question should give you some concern.

"You have seen fit to ignore all of the above considerations.

"As to the naturalized citizen, I repeat that it would be absolutely impossible for naturalized citizens to whom the amendment will apply to comply with its provisions. You claim to have carefully read the amendment, but I will venture to say that you are at this moment unable to comply with the drastic test prescribed by it, and that like Mr. Stanford, who introduced the amendment, you would fail to stand the test. For a naturalized citizen to write in English fully 15 questions from memory, without being permitted to have a copy of the question before him, is an evident impossibility. The most intelligent naturalized citizen would be unable to comply with this unreasonable and unfair test.

"Why do you ask me to 'enter in a joint discussion' with you in a 'large hall in Baltimore city?' You have been a member of the bar for many years, and should be experienced as a public speaker and debater. I am not a public speaker, much less versed in the art of public debate. If you are anxious to enter a joint discussion on the merits of the amendment, you need not go outside of your own party to find foemen worthy of your steel. A number of prominent Democratic lawyers have already publicly denounced the amendment in the severest terms, and could discuss it more convincingly than I could possibly do.

"As an inducement you suggest (if I rightly understand your letter) that you may be perhaps converted to my views regarding the measure, and, in this contingency, you promise to aid me in defeating it.

"I am well aware, sir, that you have shown yourself so far open-minded on this subject as to completely change the views you expressed during the campaign for and against the Poe amendment. In the Baltimore Sun of July 22, 1905, I find a report prepared by you, and adopted by the Cresent Club, in which you say of the so-called 'grandfather clause:

" 'The second and third sections of the amendment are undemocratic and create class distinction. It is an attempt to incorporate into our political institutions the doctrine of hereditary right. So inimical to free government did the founders of our republic regard any class government based upon heredity that they prohibited by legislative enactments any titled aristocracy or the acceptance of titled honors from foreign potentates and they even abolished primogeniture. Why should one individual, through unworthy to exercise the right of franchise be entitled to do so because be happens to have been the descendant of an ancester who was entitled to vote before a certain date, while another, thought worthy in every respect, not being the descendant of such a person must undergo an extra test of the kind laid down?'

"There are the same attempts to 'create class distinctions' and 'incorporate into our political institutions the doctrine of hereditary right' in the amendment you now support, but since you obtained your present position you appear to have seen a new light.

"In the same report you says:

" 'The results of this measure will be unfair, retrogressive, instead of progressive; iniquitous, discriminative and productive of tyrannnical acts. . . . For years in this state party fealty has been judged mainly by fealty to the bosses. . . . Citizens of Maryland, we appeal to you, your manhood, your suffrage is in peril. In the shadow of the negro are lurking men tempting to wrest from you by specious and artful legislation your rights of suffrage. If you hearken to the specious plea of negro disfranchisement and pass this amendment, you will soon awaken to the realization that, like Esau, you have sold your birthbright for a mere mess of pottage.

"While the methods of the Poe amendment and those of that now pending differ their purpose is the same. The difference lies altogether in means, not in ends. Both were framed for the benefit of 'the bosses' to whom you refer, and intended to make their rule assured and permanent by making Maryland a one-party state.

"Had the Poe amendment been adopted it would have been a matter of indifference to your 'bosses' whether the city's clerks were detected in wholesale peculations or police magistrates in attempted bribery of grand jurors, or chairman of Democratic committee were changed for such reason as led to your own substitution for Mr. Rusk. Trifles such as these, even the far graver scandals which, in the past, have marked the reign of such 'bosses' in Maryland, would have then caused them no concern; for, whatever independent voters might think or independent newspapers might say of such shameful incidents, in a one-party state public opinion is nothing, party fealty is everything; and in your own words, 'party fealty' means practically, for Democrats in Maryland, 'fealty to the bosses.' Such was the purpose and such would have been the fruits of the Poe amendment; such is likewise the purpose and, if it shall be adopted, such will be likewise the fruits of the pending amendment. The purpose was and is wicked. The results would have been and will be disastrous to our state and her people and to all hope of honest government and pure politics in Maryland. I do not believe any useful end will be attained by r y d scussing these question publicly with one who has thought and talked about them as you did in 1905 and who talks and professes to think about them as you do now; perhaps you might be reconverted by arguments like those which caused your conversion, but such arguments are not at my commaud.

"In conclusion, permit me to say that it is a well-known resort of the upholders of a lost cause to attempt to revive it and to deceive the people by issuing challenges, and I have no desire to aid you in your efforts in behalf of this most unholy proposition.

"I remain, yours respectfully,

"WM. F. STONE."

District Assessors Named.

At the session of the County Commissioners held this week the following persons were selected as district assessors for the ensuing year: District No. 1, Theo. George; No. 2, Wm. H. Thomas; No. 3, John Stark; No. 4, Floyd Duckworth; No. 5, Frank Callis; No. 6, John Sines; No. 7, C. J. Rathbun; No. 8, John W. Biggs; No. 9, Urias McKenzie; No. 10, Wm. Nine; No. 11, Charles A. THE DEATH RECORD.

DAVID T. BECKMAN.

Mr. David T. Beckman, superintendent of the mines at Chaffee, the well known citizen of Grant county, died at his home at the above named place on Saturday morning, May 1, at 12:30. Mr. Beckman was born in Garrett county, Maryland, April 17, 1865, being 44 years and fourteen days old at the time of his death. He came to this state at the age of twenty-one and has lived in it ever since. He was united in marriage to Capto'ia Nethkin April 16, 1888, and lived a happy married life twenty-one years. To them were born six children all living, who mourn the loss of a good father. He was held in the highest regard by all who knew him, and by those especially who were under his employ. This was shown by the large crowd who came far and near to attend the funeral. He leaves a father, mother, wife, six children, five brothers, six sisters and a number of other relatives and friends to mourn his loss. He was converted and joined the United Brethren church in the year 1906 and stood true to his profession till death. The funeral services were held in the M. E. church at Elk Garden by the writer, assisted by Rev. Gray of the Methodist Episcopal church, and the interment was made in the cemetery near by. Surely a good husband, a loving father, dear brother and a true follower of Christ has fallen in the ranks of the church militant.

To his memory sweet peace,
To his body, calm repose,
To his soul, blessed immortality.

B. F. DOTSON, Pastor.

HUGH M'MILLAN, SR.

Mr. Hugh McMillan, sr., of Garrett county, near Lonaconing, died Saturday night shortly before midnight, death resulting from infirmities of old age.

The death of Mr. McMillan brings to a close a varied and useful earthly career, amid surroundings most humble, but comfortable.

This venerable old gentleman was born in Kilmarnock, Ayrshire, Scotland, on August 19, 1818. In June, 1832, he left his native soil for Nova Scotia, where for nine years he worked in the Albion mines. He was married in 1839 to Miss Margaret Scott and continued to live in Nova Scotia until 1841, when he came to the United States with his wife. He settled at Pottsville, Pa., and spent three years working in the coal mines of that region. He then moved to Cumberland, where he remained about one year, leaving in 1845 for Bolivar, Pa. After spending several years in the coal fields of Pennsylvania, Mr. McMillan returned to Nova Scotia, where he remained for about two years.

In 1852 Mr. McMillan first set foot in Lonaconing and from that time on he became identified with its life and growth. He was a wonderfully well read man, having received a good educatiod during his younger days. For this reason he was never long idle, for when the mines were not working, he followed the vocation of a school master. Many of the older residents of Lonaconing received their early education at his hands. He was regarded as a most expert mathematician. For several years he taught school at Vale Summit. Later he became actively engaged in school work in Lonaconing. He taught his first class of Lonaconing pupils in the Hanekamp building on Brewery Hill. After teaching there for some time the owner, Mr. Henry Hanekamp, moved into the building and Mr. McMillan rented a house from Mr. William Atkinson in the same neigborhood. In the early seventies he removed his pupils to a school house on Log Row, and in this "Old Jackson School" house many of Lonaconing's residents received their early teaching. As a coal miner he helped put down the first slope of the Maryland mines at Eckhart, in 1859, and took charge, as managing agent, of the Franklin and Phoenix mines from 1861 to 1868. During the civil war, Mr. McMillan was twice drafted for service by the Federal government. His son, Hugh, however, enlisted and was killed at the second battle of Bull Run. Mr. McMillan named another son after the one who was killed during the war. Mr. McMillan's wife died in August, 1903. He leaves ten children: George and Hugh, of District No. 11, Garrett county; James, of Lonaconing, and John, of Pittsburg; Mrs. James Wier, Mrs. F. P. Green and Mrs. John Green, all of District No. 11, Garrett county; Mrs. Thomas Bell, Mrs. Daniel Young and Mrs. John Johnson, all of Lonaconing.

He was a member of Philos Lodge, No. 91, I. O. O. F. of Westernport. The funeral took place at 2:30 o'clock Tuesday afternoon, at the Lonaconing Presbyterian church with interment in Oak Hill cemetery, Lonaconing, Rev. A. C. Thomson, pastor of the Lonaconing Presbyterian church, officiating.

MRS. JANE LAMB.

Mrs. Jane Lamb, a former resident of Lonaconing, Allegany county, died on Sunday morning at the home of her daughter, Mrs. John Plaskett, at Selbysport, this county, aged 76 years. The deceased lady leaves surviving her two sons, David, of Lonaconing, and John, of Walkersville, Montana, and four daughters, Mrs. John Plaskett, of Selbysport; Mrs. John Tanyge, of Walkersville, Mont.; Mrs. William Taylor and Mrs. W. H. Freeland, of Cumberland; also one sister who resides in Montana. Mrs. Lamb's remains were taken from Selbysport to Lanaconing, on Monday and yesterday her funeral occurred, the interment being made in the cemetery at Moscow Mills, Allegany county. Rev. Browning, of the M. E. church at that place, officiating.

"Drys" Resting Easy.

Judge John W. Mason refused to grant an alternative writ of mandamus to O. F. McMillan, at Fairmont. Several weeks ago McMillan was deposed as a member of the Fairmont council on the grounds that he was not a free holder and consequently could not lawfully hold the office. In giving the decision Judge Mason affirmed the power of the council to depose any of its members or any city official on good grounds. He refused the writ in every particular. At the next meeting night, the council will select the successor to Mr. McMillan and as tne drys are now in power they will select a dry man and make their majority safe.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. THE LAST VOYAGE OF THE DONNA ISABEL

BY RANDALL PARRISH

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man marooned by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER V.

In Which We Gain the Deck.

I paused a moment amid the dense shadows to reflect more carefully upon some of the details of our night's work. For the first time I clearly realized the desperate nature of this adventure upon which I was so recklessly embarked. Could we once attain the yacht's deck unobserved and make our attack with sufficient swiftness to prevent the discharge of firearms, the rest might be accomplished without great risk of discovery, barring some unexpected mishap. The very audacity of such an attempt was strongly in our favor. If we succeeded in silently warping the Esmeralda beyond range of the guns of the shore batteries all real and immediate danger would be over. Probably not a war vessel in the harbor had steam up, and, if they did, no Chilean warship could hope to overhaul us when once fairly at sea.

I gave the personnel of the crew Tuttle had collected brief consideration. They were no rougher than I should naturally expect men to be who were volunteering for such a task. Besides, Jack ashore and Jack at sea are two widely differing personalities; once sobered and on shipboard, steadied somewhat by the perils of their position, and exhilarated by the promised reward, they would doubtless prove efficient enough. Tuttle might require a lesson in sea etiquette, and, if he did, I felt perfectly confident of my ability to administer it promptly and forcibly. As for De Nova, I had no doubt that he would prove himself a good man. So, altogether, my spirits rose as I thus contemplated a definite plan of action.

The movement on the water was only the merest ripple, with the riding lights of the various ships at anchor reflected back as from a giant mirror. Two vessels, a full-rigged ship and a small schooner, lay close in shore, apparently deserted, their decks gloomy wastes, their bare spars sticking up skeleton-like and ghostly. Farther out, and somewhat to the left, a yellow lantern, perhaps in the bow of a guardboat, bobbed about, zig-zagging here and there like some erratic star. It was some time before I could locate with any certainty the particular vessel I sought. The harbor was littered with sea craft of every description, and my knowledge regarding the Esmeralda was most meager, being merely her point of anchorage, and that she was a large steam-yacht, schooner rigged.

Finally, into the focus of the leveled glasses there crept indistinctly the delicate tracery of her bow, rendered more plainly visible beneath the green radiance of her riding lamp. Lights were showing faintly through several portholes amidships, certain proof that she was not entirely deserted; yet the cabins aft were dark, and the only moving figure I could distinguish with certainty was slowly pacing back and forth along the lee rail of the poop. Suddenly, out from the enveloping smudge, came a shower of sparks and a red glare, and, a moment later, I traced the outlines of a steam launch cleaving the black water. It quickly vanished behind the fog wreaths hanging to seaward, the faint sound of its churning dying away, leaving the silent loneliness behind more solemnly impressive than ever. Only from off the land came echoing the noises of men—the loud vivas, the reiterated boom of explosives, the ceaseless blare of bands.

The scene became oppressive in its barrenness, and I felt the need of movement to overcome its weakening effect upon the nerves. This was to be a night of action, not of dreams, so I groped my uncertain path back along the littered wharf and around the curve of the shore line, beneath the gloomy shadows of coal sheds. Of lights there were comparatively none, if I except the uncertain glimmer of rockets along the water's surface, and I was consequently compelled to feel my way from object to object like a blinded man. Still, the course was sufficiently familiar so that I successfully maintained both footing and direction, finally emerging safely close beside the spot appointed for our rendezvous. There was considerable open space here, the Mercantile Company's sheds standing some 30 feet back of the shore line, and their wharf for the unloading of barges extending more than 50 feet out into the harbor. I could dimly perceive a great crane at the farther extremity, with dangling buckets, outlined against the sky. The night was too dark for me to decipher the face of my watch, yet it could not now be long before the arrival of the men. I crouched down beside a post to await their coming, once again searching the harbor with my night-glasses.

The company at last arrived by twos from out the enveloping gloom, silently grouping themselves amid the shadows. I could distinguish an occasional gruff cough, and the shuffling of feet, but there was no sound of conversation or hilarity. Evidently De Nova had sufficiently sobered them to their duty. At last one man detached himself from among the crowd and moved stealthily forward. I met him at the shore end of the wharf, peered into his face, half-concealed beneath the visor of his cap, until I recognized the fellow.

"Crew all here, Mr. Tuttle?"

"Yes, sir," he answered, startled by my sudden appearance into courteous response, "but mighty uneasy to be off."

"They shall not be delayed. Get the boats out at once. You are to take charge of the whaleboat and I will accompany De Nova in the cutter. Pull silently to the end of the wharf and lie by there to await instructions. Do your men understand the boats they are assigned to?"

"Ay, ay, sir."

"Very well, then; get the boats out, and the crews aboard. Not a sound, remember, for there are guards patrolling the harbor."

I must confess this preparatory work was well and smartly accomplished, the men the merest silent shadows as they hauled the two hidden boats forth from concealment and quietly took their assigned places at the oars. Tuttle's crew was first afloat, De Nova experiencing some difficulty from attempting to load too near shore, in somewhat shallow water.

"Drop overboard, two of you, and shove off," I ordered, finally. "Lively now, lads, but no splashing."

The two fellows in the stern lowered themselves into the shallow water, bending down so as to put their shoulders against the planks for a heave. Suddenly, not three feet distant, a smudge of shadow uplifted, and I became conscious of a pallid human face gleaming faintly through the dark. Instantly I leaped toward it, with such force as to send the heavily laden boat swirling forward, the heaving men plunging face downward into the water. There was a startled exclamation in Spanish, a short-arm blow shot into a dimly revealed, half-familiar face, a fierce grip at the throat, and the two of us were on the sand, grappling like wild cats. Out of the water, dripping from their bath, the two seamen came to my aid, and, between us, we pinned the fellow to helpless silence.

"Toss him into the boat," I said, panting from exertion. "He will be safer with us than left ashore."

It appeared even darker out on the water than when we looked off upon it from the land, but, with a few cautious strokes, we discovered the smudge which represented Tuttle's whaleboat, and drew up within an oar's length of where he lay waiting.

"Mr. Tuttle," I began, speaking slowly and concisely so that the men in both boats could hear, "this is going to be no boy's play to-night, and I expect implicit obedience to my orders. Do exactly what I tell you and no more. You know the situation of the Esmeralda, and I want you to put your whaleboat in under her bow. If you keep a point east of north you can scarcely miss it. There is a lumping big brigantine anchored 100 feet beyond, with only a single light showing on her foremast. If you come up under her shadow you are not likely to be seen before you drift down against the Esmeralda's cutwater. Make use of the anchor-chain, and get half a dozen men quietly over the forecastle rail. Don't move from there until you receive some signal from me. Then clap down the forecastle scuttle, and make straight for the engine room. That will comprise the entire duty of your crew; and, above all things, let it be accomplished silently. Don't permit one of your men to carry a loaded firearm. Use belaying pins, if you need to, or a marlinspike, but no guns. De Nova and I will go in by way of the stern, and we will be responsible for the after-deck and the bridge. Has any one a question to ask?"

There was no response, the only sounds audible being the soft lapping of the water and the deep breathing of the men. I could distinguish them leaning eagerly forward, but the faces were undecipherable in the gloom.

"You understand clearly?"

"Ay, ay, Mr. Stephens," and Tuttle's nasal voice had completely lost all its former trace of insolence.

"Then pull away slowly and noiselessly; don't hurry; we'll give you plenty of time to get in. Good-by, and good luck to you."

The balanced oars dipped gently into the water, scarcely rippling it, and the sharp-stemmed whaleboat glided away into the surrounding blackness like a ghost.

"All right now, De Nova," I whispered. "I'll go forward into the bow. Keep her head off about a point and watch out for signals."

We slipped through the water silently, the sound of the dipping oar-blades little more audible than the suppressed breathing of the oarsmen. Confident that if any eyes were watching from the deck they were not likely to be directed astern, we made wide detour, creeping cautiously in beneath the slight bulge of the yacht's side, until the fellow behind me fastened his boathook firmly into the after-chains. Breathlessly we waited listening, but no sound reached us other than the slight hiss of escaping steam.

The Two of Us Were on the Sand, Grappling Like Wild Cats.

"Hold hard!" I whispered, the word passing back from man to man. "Two remain with the boat, the rest follow me."

I crept silently up into the chains and peered cautiously over onto the open deck. It was wrapped in darkness and silence, the sole gleam of revealing light coming from out the open main-hatch, and that only the merest glimmer slightly illuminating the ship amidships. There was a lamp alight in the after-cabin, but the shades were drawn so closely I could scarcely perceive its presence. I became aware that De Nova stood beside me.

"There is certainly no watchman aft," I announced, softly, "unless he be found upon the other side of the cabin. Batten down the companionway while I examine the deck. Two of you men come with me."

We dropped over the low rail together, moving silently in our stocking-feet. The roof of the cabin, forming the quarter deck, extended clear to the rail. We groped over this shadowed space as though exploring a cave, encountering nothing except a few camp stools, although my fingers discovered a goodly sized boat swinging from davits across the stern. From the opposite side we could peer forward toward the dim light streaming from out the hatch, the deck being thus fairly revealed as far as the funnel. Beyond all remained black and impenetrable. A man sat upon a bench against the side of the galley, a dull red showing from his pipe bowl. His earliest knowledge of our presence was when the two men closed on his windpipe, and I pressed a revolver muzzle against his cheek.

"Not a sound, Jack," I muttered sternly in Spanish, "or else your life pays for it."

The pipe fell with a click to the deck, the fellow's eyes staring up at us, his opened mouth showing oddly amid a surrounding gray beard. A moment later, securely gagged and bound, we rolled his body close in against the rail.

"I thought I heard a bit of a blow and a yelp on the fo'castle just now, sir," said one of the men, pointing eagerly forward. I stood still, intently listening, staring into the gloom.

"Quiet enough there at present. Probably Mr. Tuttle has been attending to the for'ard watch. Come on, lads, and we'll join forces with him."

Beyond all doubt the main deck was clear as far as the bridge, and, providing Tuttle's crew had attended to their share of the work, as far as the fo'castle head as well. We advanced cautiously, keeping close within the denser shade along the weather rail, pausing a moment to peer over the edge of the open hatchway into the illuminated space below. Two Kanakas, naked to the waist, their slim, brown bodies glistening, each grasping the handle of a coal scoop, were backed up against a bulkhead conversing, while on a low stool, tipped back to a comfortable angle, his feet on the rounded crosspiece, a pipe in his mouth, his hands buried deep in his pockets, sat a white man, with red face and long, sandy mustaches. His brown overalls and pink undershirt told nothing distinctive, but the uniform cap, pushed well back on his bristling stock of hair, proclaimed him the vessel's engineer. As I drew back from this swift survey, Mr. Tuttle suddenly rounded the end of the chart-house, and, with whispered word of inquiry to one of the men, advanced to meet me.

"Well," I said as soon as certain of his identity, "the after-deck is ours without a blow; what have you discovered forward?"

"Two men were posted on the fo'castle, sir," he returned, the disagreeable nasal tone apparent even in his subdued voice. "We got them both, but Mason was pricked with a knife during the scuffle."

"Did you close the fo'castle?" I questioned briefly.

"All fast, sir, but I doubt if any of the crew are below."

"Well, there are some down in the engine room, and the fellow in charge looks as if he might fight on occasion. Take half a dozen men with you, and jump below. The Kanakas won't make any serious trouble, but you had better clap a gun to the engineer."

I watched them as they swarmed like rats over the hatch-combing and dropped down into the light. There was a scurrying of bodies, a sharp exchange of blows, a yelp of alarm from the startled Kanakas, a stout volley of English oaths, and, when the tangle partially cleared away, the engineer was lying flat on his back, the knee of the big singer at Rodrigues' at his chest, and Tuttle holding a blue-barreled revolver at his ear. I never beheld an angrier man, but he was helpless as a baby. Assured of the future of the engine room, I mounted the steps and took a hasty survey of both bridge and wheelhouse. They were unoccupied—the vessel was entirely in our possession.

CHAPTER VI.

In Which We Attain the Open Sea.

Our adventure had been successfully accomplished through its first step; now it remained to get safely out to sea. As I turned to retrace my steps to the deck I encountered De Nova coming up.

"Pretty lucky job, monsieur," he said, jovially. "It was w'at you call ze picnic, I bet. Ze companion was lock', an' ze guard posted. W'at more now for me?"

"Relieve Mr. Tuttle in the engine room. Keep three men below there with you, and arm them as guards. Make the Kanakas do the firing, and hold the engineer to it with a gun at his head. You know enough about a stoke-hole to tell whether things are going right, don't you?"

He nodded, and I could see the gleam of his white teeth.

"Then get your steam up, but don't let those fellows fire so as to drive any flame out of the stack, and watch that Johnny Bull so that he can't put any kinks in the machinery. Don't take your eyes off him. Do you understand the signals?"

"Ay, ay, monsieur."

"Then stand by. We'll tow out at once with the boats, but I want you ready for business the very moment we cast off the lines. Send all the rest of the men on deck and ask Mr. Tuttle to report to me here immediately."

I was not kept waiting. Two men came stumbling up the companionway together. I peered at them, uncertain of their identity in the gloom.

"Is that you, Mr. Tuttle?"

"Yes, sir. This is Johnson, one of the wheelsmen; thought you would likely need him, so I brought him along."

"Very good. Johnson, go on up into the wheelhouse and see that all is clear. I'll give you directions later. Mr. Tuttle, we'll tow out until we get the sweep of the sea fairly under our fore foot. Get the lines out to the boats at once, with full crew at the oars. You are to take command, and I shall have to trust you for the course, as we can't risk signaling. I presume you are acquainted with the harbor lights?"

"Been in here eight times in ten years without a pilot."

"Then you ought to know the course, but take no chances; feel your way, only keep the ropes taut. Have you any man fit to take charge of the second boat? I need De Nova below."

"The boatswain, sir; that big fellow with the scar."

"What's his name?"

"Bill Anderson."

"All right; put him in the cutter. Leave me three men on deck, and post the best one of the lot at the stern line ready to cast off. As soon as you get the ropes out I'll slip the anchor-chain, and leave the flukes in the mud. Work lively now; we must be well out at sea before daylight."

He stood leaning against the rail, peering out over the water, his hands shading his eyes.

"Have you spotted any guardboats with your glasses?" he questioned, uneasily.

"Only that one yonder; see, the yellow light just rounding the stem of that big brig. There was a steam-launch out there to the west about 20 minutes ago, but it seems to have disappeared."

"Swallowed up in the fog likely," he admitted, snuffling the air like a pointer dog. "We'll find it banked pretty heavy outside, or I'm a lubber. Well, so much the better for our job. All right, Mr. Stephens, I'm off, and we'll have you in tow in a jiffy. I'll put the nigger at the stern line; he's the best all-round hand on board."

However I may have disliked and distrusted the whaleman he certainly proved himself an able seaman and a smart officer. He comprehended every detail of his work, and held his men to it finely. Within 20 minutes we were in motion, moving slowly, yet steadily, toward the black vacancy outlined by the harbor lights on either hand. There was no disturbing sound to betray progress, the yacht's sharp cutwater cleaving its passage through the liquid with the merest faint ripple, scarcely leaving a gleam of white foam behind, the oars dipping silently, the two lines held taut to the strain. Exultant, I climbed once again to the bridge, gave a few directions to the observant Johnson standing motionless at the wheel, and leaned anxiously over the rail, studying the waterfront through leveled glasses.

It was a barren, deserted waste, except for a deeply laden schooner beating slowly up along the north shore under closely reefed topsails, and the gleaming lights of a large steamer just beginning to emerge faintly through the curtain of fog a trifle to the left of our course. The towing boats appeared as two insignificant blots on the surface, but that they were making excellent progress was proved by the way we were steadily drawing up toward the outer lights, already shining round and yellow through the increasing haze.

How dark, silent, uncanny the gloom-enshrouded yacht appeared as I leaned over the tarpaulin-protected rail and gazed down on the deserted decks, no movement, no gleam of light anywhere visible. The two masts, for the vessel was schooner-rigged, rose rakishly and with noble sweep into the sky, yet I could trace little of the cordage against the expanse of cloud. They appeared skeleton-like reeds to be broken by a gust of wind. A slight fringe of white water alone marked our progress, while a misty vapor of escaping steam spoke of the chained engine and hissing boilers below. As I rested thus, the watchful Johnson grasping the spokes behind me, the momentous events of the past few hours swept through my mind like fragments of a strange, disconnected dream—my seemingly hopeless plight in Valparaiso; my controversy with Lieut. Sanchez; my brief meeting with the Englishman; the friendly eyes of Doris; the throb of sudden interest aroused by her presence and as quickly lost again; the sudden swinging of the pendulum of Fate; the approach of De Castillo bringing unexpected opportunity for action and escape, and those later events which had so rapidly followed. I struck my hand hard against the iron rail to assure myself I was awake, and to arouse my dormant faculties to action.

"Hold her steady as she is, Johnson," I said, my voice tremulous from sudden awakening. "I'm going down to recall the boats."

"Steady as she is, sir."

In the engine room, two seamen, each grasping a gun, leaned negligently against a bulkhead, while De Nova, bare-headed, his little black mustache clearly outlined against the olive of his cheek, occupied the stool between them. The Kanaka firemen were out of sight, but the red-faced engineer was on his knees tinkering over a refractory bolt with a monkey-wrench.

"Everything working all right, Mr. De Nova?" I questioned, quietly.

The eyes of the four men instantly turned toward me, the engineer straightening up, monkey-wrench in hand.

"No troubles here, monsieur," and the mate rose to his feet, his white teeth showing. "W'ere are we now?"

"Just off the point, with the light-house dropping astern, and the swell of the ocean under our forefoot. I am going to call in the boats. Have you plenty of coal?"

"Bunkers all full, monsieur."

"How is your steam?"

He stepped over to the gauge, peering at it across the burly shoulder of the engineer, who still stood staring at me.

"Pretty near up to ze danger mark, monsieur."

"Then stand by for signals."

The engineer came to life as though treated to an electric shock, his fist, still grasping the monkey-wrench, suddenly extended, his red face purpling with passion.

"You damned, bloody pirate!" he yelled, glaring at me savagely. "It's hung the whole lot of you will be for this bloody night's work. No, I won't keep still, you moon-faced mulatto. I'm a free-born Briton, an' I'll smash in the heads of some of you yet, an' I'll live to see the rest hung in chains for the bloody pirates you are. Just wait till you're caught, an' then you won't be grinnin' that way at an honest man. Oh, you'll git it all right, my fine lads. There'll be hell to pay for this job, let me tell you! It's on nothin' you'll be dancin' then, you murderin' spawn o' hell!"

"You Damned Bloody Pirate!" He Yelled, Glaring at Me Savagely.

De Nova pressed the barrel of a revolver into the man's neck, with a stern threat and an unpleasant gleaming of white teeth. The sailors remained leaning on their guns, grinning as if in enjoyment of the play.

"Never min' w'at he say, sir," and the mate glanced up toward me, as if in apology. 'He bust out zat way ever' fiv' minutes since we be down here. We have club him, two, t'ree time, but he stick here just ze same, an' run ze engine. Oui, oui, it just ze way wiz ze bull-headed Englisher."

"I see," I acknowledged, drawing back, "only watch that he doesn't kink the machinery."

I was not in the least surprised at discovering one of his nationality in charge of the vessel's engine room, nor was I sorry. He would feel little real interest in the affair, after he once clearly comprehended the situation, while a native Chilean might be impelled by a spirit of patriotism to cause us serious trouble. Englishmen were very frequently met with in foreign engine rooms; this fellow had probably been picked up because of better qualifications than any native applicant; or, indeed, he might have been a member of the original crew of the yacht before it was disposed of to the government. I would have a talk with him later; meanwhile he was certainly in good hands; and I had enough else to attend to. The tow-ropes came in hand over hand, and were coiled dripping on the forecastle deck. At the end of them the two boats emerged from out the fog, and the men tumbled in silently over the rail. I watched from the vantage of the bridge, as the whole crew tailed onto the falls, distinguishing Tuttle's nasal tones above the incessant shuffling of feet.

I pulled the signal cord, dimly distinguishing the faint responsive tinkle of the bell far beneath. Like a hound suddenly released for the chase, the steamer sprang forward into the fog wreaths and buried her sharp nose in the sea.

MAKES DAINTY CHICKEN SALAD.

Royal Icing Adds Much to Good Quality of the Dish.

Four hard-boiled eggs, three ounces cooked chicken, one lettuce, some water cress. Cut the eggs neatly into halves lengthways and put the yolks into a basin, rub them till smooth with a wooden spoon, add a little mayonnaise sauce gradually. When these are well mixed, stir in the chicken cut in small dice, two tablespoonfuls of cooked peas and half the lettuce and watercress pulled into small pieces. Season these carefully and fill each half of egg, neatly heaping the mixture up. Have ready some neat oval pieces of fried bread, on these place the pieces of egg. Arrange on a dish and garnish with the rest of the lettuce and watercress, and, if liked, a little chopped aspic jelly.

Roll it out about half an inch thick, stamp it into rounds the size of the top of a teacup, put them on a greased baking tin, and bake them in a moderate oven. Leave them until cold. Spread a thin layer of white royal icing on each, then pipe the date of the pear on in pale pink icing.

To make the royal icing: One pound of confectioner's sugar, one white of egg and juice of half a lemon. Sift the sugar into a basin, add the white of egg and lemon juice. Beat the icing well for ten minutes—this will whiten it.

RASPED ROLLS ARE UNCOMMON.

Dainty That Will Be Appreciated at the Morning Meal.

Put one cup of boiling water into a mixing bowl, in which is placed one-half tablespoon of butter or lard, one-half tablespoon of sugar, three-fourths teaspoon salt. When lukewarm add one yeast cake dissolved in one-fourth cup lukewarm water. Add three cups of sifted flour, mix well, and toss on a well floured bread board, and knead until smooth and elastic. Use as little flour as possible while kneading. Cover and set to rise in a warm place.

When double in bulk, cut down without removing mixture from bowl; let rise again. When light, shape as bath buns; place on a buttered sheet two inches apart (they must not touch each other), cover with a tea towel, set to rise. When light bake 25 minutes in a "bread oven," until the entire surface of each roll is a uniform brown color.

Then grate off a thin layer from the outside crust with a grating machine, or a coarse horseradish grater will answer for this purpose. Great care must be taken in this process that the outer thin brown crust may be removed evenly.

Recipe for Chili Sauce.

Scald, skin and mash enough tomatoes to measure one gallon; add six onions, ten green medium sized peppers chopped very fine; bring to a slow boil; add one cupful vinegar, one small cupful sugar, two tablespoonfuls salt. Tie in a fine bag two tablespoonfuls each of cinnamon, allspice, cloves, ginger or nutmeg. Mix well and boil slowly two hours. I have used and improved on this recipe for 15 years and have never come across a better one. In making the chili sauce one can use her own judgment about the taste to suit the palate. It is very essential that the spice be put in a bag, as it vastly improves taste and color.

Danish Stew.

Take two good sized stalks of celery, cut up or dice, put into three pints of water and cook till celery is tender. Season with salt and pepper, add two tablespoonfuls of flour made into a paste with cold water. Then take one pound and a half of chopped beef seasoned with salt and pepper and two tablespoonfuls of bread or cracker crumbs, one-half of an average sized common onion, cut up fine, and one egg; mix together and form in balls and stew for ten to fifteen minutes with other ingredients until done.

Amber Pie.

One cup preserves (strawberry or blackberry are best), 1½ cups sugar, one cup rich cream, yolks of four eggs, one heaping tablespoon flour, one tablespoon butter, and flavoring (lemon or vanilla). Cook in double boiler until it becomes a thick custard. Line pie plate with paste, put in custard and cook. Whip whites of eggs to dry froth, add sugar to taste. When pie is done spread over top; return to oven to set fawn color.

Our Educational System Must Be Equal to the Best.

By Dr. ELMER ELLSWORTH BROWN, United States Commissioner of Education.

FOR the most part higher education has been carried on by institutions singularly isolated one from another. The state has conferred upon them academic powers, but has not defined their academic responsibilities.

The reproach against our American education, that it means ANYTHING OR NOTHING according to circumstances, is not merely resented or ignored, nor is it merely accepted as inevitable. Steps are taken to remove the sting from that reproach by making it no longer applicable.

THE QUESTION CAN NOW BE FAIRLY PUT TO THE LEGISLATURES OF THE SEVERAL STATES: IS IT JUST AND RIGHT TO INCORPORATE INSTITUTIONS FOR THE INSTRUCTION OF OUR PEOPLE AND AUTHORIZE THEM TO GIVE ACADEMIC DEGREES AND CERTIFICATES, WITH NO PROVISION FOR DETERMINING THE GENUINENESS AND WORTH OF THOSE SCHOLASTIC LABELS?

False pretenses in the realm of education are a peculiarly flagrant form of fraud, for THEY CHEAT OUR AMERICAN YOUTH OF THEIR AMERICAN RIGHT TO A FAIR CHANCE. They operate no less disastrously when the fraud is unconsciously committed—that is, when competent teachers and school authorities offer an inferior grade of instruction under the delusion that it is as GOOD AS THE BEST. The well meaning no less than the dishonest need some IMPARTIAL TEST by which their educational offering may be proved, of which sort it is.

A NATIONAL STANDARD OF EDUCATION IS AN IMPERATIVE NEED, AND NO NATIONAL STANDARD CAN BE ADEQUATE OR STABLE UNTIL IT HAS BEEN CONSCIOUSLY REFERRED TO THE WORLD STANDARD OF OUR TIME.

In endeavoring to establish American standards we must not stop short of this ultimate step, the critical comparison of the standards proposed for our own land with those recognized by the rest of the civilized world. Otherwise we shall simply have passed from one provincialism to another—a broader, more conspicuous and therefore more glaring provincialism.

OUR EDUCATIONAL RELATIONS WITH THE REST OF THE WORLD CAN NEVER BE ON A SATISFACTORY BASIS TILL WE ARE IN A POSITION TO DO OUR FULL PART IN DETERMINING WHAT THE WORLD STANDARD SHALL BE.

Responsibility For Corrupt Politics Rests With the Public.

By Senator Elect THEODORE E. BURTON of Ohio.

THE BOSS IS A REPULSIVE FIGURE IN OUR POLITICAL LIFE, BUT NO BOSS COULD HOLD SWAY FOR A YEAR WITHOUT THE INDIFFERENCE OF A LARGE BODY OF CITIZENS OR WITHOUT THE CO-OPERATION OF LARGE BUSINESS OR OTHER INTERESTS WHICH DESIRE TO AVOID THE COMPLEXITY OF DEALING WITH BOARDS OF ALDERMEN, LEGISLATIVE BODIES AND EXECUTIVES. IT IS THEIR GREAT WISH TO DEAL WITH SINGLE INDIVIDUALS WHO DICTATE THE ACTION OF THE DIFFERENT AGENCIES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

In return these supporters of the bosses are willing to give great largesses in the way of CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS and bring to the the support of any party LARGE NUMBERS OF VOTERS. This does not mean, however, that any party organization should shape the policies of a political party or dictate to executive or legislator what he shall do.

Copyright by Harris & Ewing.

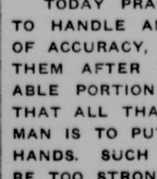
While we should in nowise condone offenses in political or commercial life, the real responsibility can for the most part be TRACED TO THE PEOPLE THEMSELVES or at least to the state of public spirit and the standards of morality of the great majority. Success is worshiped, and in the formation of our judgment of the successful man the dividing line between uprightness and devious methods is not always well defined. When public officials are convicted of scandalous conduct the most probable theater of action for them is found in communities where standards of morality are low.

THE CRYING EVIL IS IN THE INDIFFERENCE OF THE GREAT MASS OF INTELLIGENT AND PATRIOTIC VOTERS.

Weaknesses of Our Army

By Major General J. FRANKLIN BELL, Chief of Staff of United States Army.

IT is a discouraging fact that in case of a sudden outbreak of hostilities with a first class nation there are NOT SUFFICIENT REGULAR TROOPS in the country, even when re-enforced by the national guard of the various states, to form an army after deducting the necessary force to provide a small garrison at our permanent posts and the necessary infantry supports for our seacoast fortifications. These latter are defenseless against a land force of the enemy unless provision has been made for a sufficiently strong supporting force.



Copyright by Clinedinst, Washington.

The statutes relating to the organization of volunteer forces are WHOLLY INADEQUATE, and a comprehensive measure replacing the present laws and dealing with the subject in the light of present conditions should be placed among the laws of our country without unnecessary delay.

TODAY PRACTICALLY NONE OF OUR CITIZENS KNOW HOW TO HANDLE AND SHOOT MODERN RIFLES WITH ANY DEGREE OF ACCURACY, AND THERE IS NOT SUFFICIENT TIME TO TRAIN THEM AFTER THE OUTBREAK OF HOSTILITIES. A CONSIDERABLE PORTION OF THE CITIZENS OF OUR COUNTRY BELIEVE THAT ALL THAT IS REQUIRED TO MAKE A SOLDIER OUT OF A MAN IS TO PUT HIM IN UNIFORM AND PLACE A RIFLE IN HIS HANDS. SUCH AN IDEA, DANGEROUS TO THE NATION, CANNOT BE TOO STRONGLY OPPOSED.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The Campmeeting this vear, July 6th to 15th, is expected to mark a decided forward movement under the direction of Rev. Joseph H. Smith, member of the Philadelphia M. E. Conference, and who has been heard in past years by the multitudes who gather at the great meeting. Among the more prominent ministers and evangelists who will be present and assist in the meeting we note the following: Revs. C. J. Fowler, president of the National Holiness Association; H. C. Morrison, editor of the Pentecostal Herald, and C. F. Oliver, and evangelists Aura Smith and Edwin L. Hyde. Dr. Gilmour will have charge of the music.

The Chautauqua hotel is being put in condition for the season. A tin roof is being put on by Messrs G. A. Shirer & Co., the plumbing has been changed and much improved and the house will be painted and thoroughly repaired.

Since our last report the following cottages have been rented: The Talson cottages on E street; the Feather cottage on Wheeling avenue; the Wm. Smouse cottage on Pittsburg avenue and the Snyder cottage on I street.

Mr. T. B. Doman, who is erecting a merchant mill in Loch Lynn, is here with a force of workmen putting up the basement which will be concrete, the balance of the structure being wood. The building will be completed and ready for operation in the early fall. Mr. Doman expects in the near future to erect a dwelling house and make Loch Lynn his future home.

The little child of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Harvey, which has been so critically ill for the past week, is much better.

Miss Gussie Mumaw left yesterday morning for Bridgeport, Ohio, to enter the Deaconess Training Home at that place.

News comes to Rev. J. O. Bolton that his wife is rapidly recovering from the effect of the operation undergone by her in Wheeling recently.

Services in the M. E. church next Sunday will be as follows: class meeting at 10.00 a. m.; Sunday School, 2.30 p. m.; Epworth League, 7.00 p. m., and preaching, 8.00 p. m.

Hon. Philip Willett's address last Friday evening was a rich treat to those in attendance.

We understand that Mr W. C. Dunnington has leased the Mountain Lake Park Hotel for a term of three years.

Messrs. Eugene Comerford and Carl Frame, of Fairmont, W. Va., arrived in the Park yesterday, having driven across the country. Other members of the families will follow by rail.

Dr. and Mrs. Talison, of New York were here this week for a few days. They will be here later for the season.

The Imp. O. R. M. held their anniversary meeting in the M. E. church last evening. Able addresses were delivered by Rev. C. W. Hudson and A. Totten Matthews, Esq.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. William Moody left for Washington on a business trip on Thusday mornin. He expects to visit relatives in Baltimore city before he returns.

Mrs. William Rowland, of Blaine, accompanied by her little daughter, was a visitor to Beryl the first of the week. Mrs. Rowland came down to see her brother, Mr. Joseph Tibbetts who is convalescing from an operation for appendicitis.

Mr. Lee Ott, general manager of the Davis Coal & Coke Co's colleries, with headquarters at Thomas, W. Va., who was taken to Baltimore on a special train over the W. M. R. R., Monday evening, suffering from appendicitis, and who underwent an operation the day following at the Union Protestant Infirmary, is reported to be in an improved condition.

Mr. William Mickey, Jr., of Beryl, engineer on the W. M. R. R. wears a broad smile and is laying off for a few trips in honor of the birth of his first born, a boy.

The farm of Mr. Ollie Liller, about five miles north of Piedmont was sold at public sale on Wednesday and brought $4,600. The farm is underlaid with the small seam of coal.

Miss Edith Duckworth, of Firm Rock, was the guest of frends at Franklin on Thursday.

Mr. Gilead Miller, track foreman on the W. M. R. R., at Blaine, has resigned his position. In making this report the Commission has thought well to make the following explanation: Under Chapter 788 of the Acts of 1906, and Chapter 370 of the Acts of 1908, the Court House Commission has received from the Board of County Commissioners the sum of $78,000.00 and also an additional sum of $40.00 from A. D. Naylor & Company, in all $78,040.00.

This amount would have fully covered the original contracts and cost of work and materials which were $75,479.31. But as the work progressed and the building developed there were certain changes and additions, which in the opinion of the entire Commission it was eminently proper, wise and ultimately economical to make, these additions were therefore ordered, their aggregate being $4,470.00. They included stone columns in the porticos, marble floor and copper roof, all of which added materially to the character and durability of the building.

On account of the above mentioned changes, there was a deficit of $1,909.31. This amount has been met by the Board of County Commissioners and paid to the Court House Commission, and makes the total cost of the New Court House to Garrett County $79,949.31.

We feel this moderate for such a substantial and handsome structure.

NOTICE TO TAXPAYERS!

This is to notify the tax payers of Garrett county that the Annual Levy for 1909 has been made and published, and to call their attention to the following abstract Section 15, Chapter 566, Acts of 1890, relating to the discount to be allowed and the interest to be charged on all tax bills.

"All county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of the levy thereof, and on all county taxes paid on or before the 1st day of September a discount of 3 per cent. will be allowed, and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. The Treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the tax bills for county purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt given for taxes so paid. But the discount shall not be allowed unless the whole amount of state and county are paid when same is made.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, MAY 20, 1909. NUMBER 12

BENEATH THE DIGNITY OF MARYLAND'S GOVERNOR

Chief Executive Puts the "Force Bill" Into Effect in Frederick County.

Governor Crothers, the Democratic chief executive of Maryland by his actions with respect to the Republican primaries conducted last week in Frederick county, by sending to that section of the state secret service men to spy upon the methods used by his political opponents, has lowered himself in the esteem of many fair minded Democrats and all the Republicans of the State. To say the least the action of the Governor opens a way for criticism of his action and leaves a questionable doubt in the minds of every resident of the state whether or not he was honest in his intentions of forcing a fair primary or had descended to the level of the peanut politician and ward heelers of Baltimore City.

Republican Chairman John B. Hanna regards the Governor's action as unwarranted and intimates that more will be heard of it. In an interview published Tuesday Mr. Hanna said:

"The so-called force bill provided that Federal Marshals should be sent into States where there was reason to suppose the law would be violated. It was violently opposed and beaten. It has long been held over the heads of the people of Maryland as a blow at their rights contemplated by the Republican party.

"Our people have always jealously guarded their right to manage local affairs and to be judged by their neighbors when violations were charged. So much is this an established principle of our local government that the governor is not expected to send troops to quell disorders until a formal request has been made by duly authorized peace officers of the community in which the disturbance is taking place."

"They are mistaken in their man," said the Governor. "Where I feel that action is required of me I shall act, and will not be deterred by criticism."

"The Constitution of the State provides that the Governor shall see to it that the laws are faithfully observed. Detectives were requested for Frederick county by Frederick county people, who wished every safeguard thrown about the corrupt practice act. I sent them. I would do so again tomorrow under the same circumstances. I have sent out detectives before. Previous to the last election they were dispatched to several counties, most of which are Democratic counties.

"The force bill provided for Federal supervision of State elections. Our Constitution imposed upon the Governor the duty of seeing that the laws are observed. There is no similarity in the cases. One is a precautionary step on the part of local people in the interest of local laws. The other is interference on the part of Federal officials.

LAST LINK OF WAR OF 1812.

Mrs. Hester Rine, Widow of Soldier, Still Lives at 92.

Mrs. Hester Rine, now in her 92nd year, the sole remaining link of the war of 1812. Mrs. Rine, the widow of Daniel Rine who served as a private during the war of 1812, is stlll living and residing near Paw Paw, W. Va., and is at present a guest at the home of her daughter, Mrs. George Steckman, at 111 Maryland avenue, this city.

Mrs. Rine was before her marriage, Miss Hester Davis, and was married in 1835 to Daniel Rine, a veteran of the war of 1812, at the old "Brick House," on the Baltimore Pike.

Mr. Rine after the close of the war came to this vicinity and married Miss Davis and they afterward made their home near Paw Paw at what was known as Rine's Tavern at the seven mile house, it being seven miles from Orleans and about seven miles from Oldtown.

Of this union nine children were born as follows: Elizabeth, wife of Emanuel Roby, near Paw Paw; John, deceased; Daniel, at the home place; Welsey and David, residing in the west; Mary, widow of John T. Dawson, Berkerly Springs; Valeria, wife of Sandford Flour Brunswick; Harriet, wife of James Anderson, Kansas; and Clara, wife of George Steckmen, of this city, where the venerable old lady is now visiting.

Mrs. Rine's husband died in 1869 and she was granted a widow's pension, under the act of March 1878, in the year 1880, the amount was $8 per month until some time ago when the acts of Congress increased the amount to $12 per month, since which time she has drawn the larger sum. Up until about two years ago there were three widows on the pension roll, but at the present time Mrs. Rine is the sole representative of that war now on the pension roll at Washington.—Cumberland News.

Gold Mining in Garrett County.

The Black Lick Gold Mining Company, of Garrett county, Md., has elected officers for the present year, as follows: M. P. Gannon, president; P. F. White, vice-president; J. T. Kooken, secretary-treasurer. The company has made application for a charter and propose placing an engine and air drill on the ground near the workings of the old Silver Bell mine in District No. 11, near Merrill. This will cost money, but the company feels justified in spending considerable from assays made by reliable experts.

TO FIX THE BOUNDARY LINE OF TWO STATES

Planning Settlement of Controversy With West Virginia.

Attorney General Isaac Lobe Straus appeared before the United States Supreme Court at Washington Monday and asked for a date during the October term of the court when arguments could be heard in the long-pending controversy between Maryland and West Virginia over the real boundary between the two states at the most western dividing line of Maryland. It was Mr. Straus' first appearance before the court. He met Senator Isidor Rayner at the Capitol, and by him was introduced to Chief Justice Fuller and other members of the distinguished tribunal. Upon formal motion by Mr. Rayner Mr. Straus was admitted to practice before the court.

Maryland's Attorney General was clothed with unusual powers. He was authorized by the Attorney General of West Virginia and his associate, Mr. George E. Price, to ask the Supreme Court to fix a date for the argument. Chief Justice Fuller and the associate justices listened attentively to Mr. Straus, and assured him that the earliest date possible would be named for the argument.

The statement was made by Chief Justice Fuller that many applications for arguments of cases during the October term of the court had been received and that the Maryland-West Virginia boundary case would have to abide its time.

The assurance was given Mr. Straus, however, that the argument will be heard during the October term and thus will be taken another step in the settlement of a dispute between two states that has been hanging fire for over a quarter of a century.

The Supreme Court is already in the possession of voluminous maps and documents which were deposited by Mr. W. S. Bryan when he was attorney general of Maryland. Mr. Price, assistant counsel to the attorney general of West Virginia, has also filed numerous documents and maps. The Maryland survey was made by State Senator Brown, of Garrett county, who is an engineer, and Mr. Edward H. Sincell, attorney for Maryland.

May 31 a Legal Holiday.

Governor Crothers, upon the advice of Attorney-General Straus, will declare May 31 a legal holiday. Decoration Day, May 30, falls on Sunday this year and the custom has been when that occurs to observe it on the following day. The Governor in making Monday a legal holiday complied with a number of requests from organizations.

MATERIAL FOR WATER WORKS BEING PLACED

Actual Operations on the System to Begin Very Shortly.

Monday, the first car load of material for the water and Sewerage systems of Oakland was placed along Second street from Liberty to the end of the corporation line at the head of Second street, the pipe having arrived here a few days previous. Since Monday three additional cars have been unloaded and the pipe distributed along other streets of the town, so that now residents as well as visitors can readily see that Oakland has really awakened from her long slumber and has actually "got a move on."

Contractor Tunney, who has undertaken the work of installing the systems has a force of men here supervising the work of unloading the materials. A ditching machine operated by steam, is on the way here from the factory and as soon as it arrives the work of making the necessary excavations for the reception of the water and sewer pipes will be commenced. The contractor fully expects to complete the work within three months.

Annual Institute and Training School June 7-25.

Training School opens June 7 and closes June 18.

County Institute opens June 21 and closes June 25. The county examination for teachers will be held during the Training School, beginning Tuesday, June 8.

All teachers who attended the 8 weeks of Normal and the entire Training School and institute, may have their certificates renewed by submitting them to the county superintendent on or before June 7. All other teachers must take the examination. All teachers will be required to take the examination on the course of study June 28.

Teachers should bring with them to Training School Brook's Mental and Milne's Standard Arithmetics and Harvey's Grammar.

The program for the Training School will be followed during the Institute with some little changes. The work done by the Training School teachers will be taken up by the Institute instructors.

The public schools will be open for the admission of pupils on Monday, September 13, 1909.

KILLED BY FALLING TREE

Moses Lee, of Near Swanton, Lost His Life Yesterday Afternoon.

Moses Lee, aged about sixty years, of near Swanton, was killed yesterday afternoon about four o'clock by a tree falling upon him while he was engaged in peeling bark in the woods near "Wet Cut," a point along the B. & O. R. R. between Frankville and Swanton.

Mr. Lee, along with a number of other men, was engaged in felling trees and peeling bark for Oss Brothers, whose mill is located on the mountain below Swanton, and while the unfortunate man was in the act of stripping the bark from a tree that had been cut down other men of the party felled a second tree which descended and caught Mr. Lee beneath it killing him instantly. The only bruise about him was a cut near the left temple.

His body was conveyed to Swanton shortly after the accident occurred and prepared for burial. Mr. Lee leaves no family, his wife having died a number of years ago.

Nine Hundred Fat Jobs.

Maryland will be entitled to 900 census enumerators: Five supervisors at $1,500 each, with a bonus of $1 added for each 1,000 persons enumerated in their respective districts. Twenty-five or more office clerks at $15 to $30 a week for such time as they may be employed. Four hundred enumerators for Baltimore city at 2cents for each name they secure. Five hundred enumerators for the counties of Maryland at 2½ to 3 cents for each name they secure.

The 900 enumerators in Maryland will be divided among the districts according to the requirements of each. In the rural districts the task will be more difficult and will require more time than in Baltimore and larger towns. In some cases conscientious census-takers will have to tramp miles in order to add two or three names to their lists. For this reason the county men will be given more time to do their work and more money for each name secured.

Dr. Davis' Lecture.

The students of the Normal school and their friends were given a rare treat last Friday night in the illustrated lecture by Dr. W. W. Davis of Mt. Lake Park, on his travels in Europe. Leaving New York for Naples via Gibralter he traced the trip in detail giving the amusing and interesting incidents of the voyage and the fact that the pictures were taken by himself, added especial charm to the entertainment. His views and descriptions of Venice, Florence and particularly those of Rome, such as the Coliseum, the Forum, the Vatican, the Appian Way, St. Peters, etc., were not only entertaining but of the highest educational value. Dr. Davis will always be welcome at the Normal school.

OAKLAND 5 PER CENT BONDS SOLD AT $106

To the Second National Bank of Cumberland, Tuesday Afternoon.

The high water mark for municipal securities was reached Tuesday when the entire issue of $45,000 of Water Works and Sewerage Bonds issued by the town of Oakland was purchased by the Second National Bank of Cumberland, Md., at its bid of $106 for the entire issue.

As advertised by the Mayor and Council the bids were received until two o'clock in the afternoon when they were opened and the award made to the highest bidder.

Quite a number of banking institutions bid for the issue, among them being the two local banks, a Baltimore bank and one or two other like institutions located in other parts of the country.

The sale of the bonds at the above price will net the town about $2700 in premiums. The bonds run for a period of fifty years from the date of issue, the first one being payable in June, 1914, and yearly thereafther the municipalty will redeem one bond.

Big Coal Companies Form Consolidation.

A special from Baltimore tells of the consolidation of a number of immense coal companies interested in Maryland, West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Kentucky coal lands.

The new company will be known as the Consolidated Coal company and it has a capital stock of twenty millions. It controls 200,000 acres of coal lands in the four states.

The principal company taken over by the consolidation is that of the Fairmont Coal company with twelve millions capital. Others in the combine are the Somerset Coal company with four millions; the Pittsburg and Fairmont Fuel company, with two and a quarter millions; the Clarksburg Fuel company, with one and a quarter millions; the Southern Coal and Transportation company, with half a million.

In the deal there 12,000 acres of Maryland coal, 58,000 acres of Pennsylvania coal, 100,000 acres of West Virginia and 30,000 acres of Kentucky. All of the coal transferred is the Pittsburg seam, nine feet in thickness.

Wreck at Barnum.

A northbound freight train, heavily loaded with coal, was wrecked Sunday evening at 5:30 o'clock, at Barnum, by a bursted wheel, fifteen wooden and steel hoppers being derailed. Traffic was blocked and wrecking crews worked all night and Monday morning clearing away the debris. Passenger trains were delayed. No one was hurt.

A Change of View

By ELOISE MONTGOMERY

(Copyright, by Ford Pub. Co.)

The hooks creaked distressingly as the hammock was viciously swung to and fro. Kathleen was distinctly in a bad humor. Here she was at the house party, with every one looking askance at her because Archie Hagood had suddenly left early that morning. It was after one now, and soon her hostess and the other guests would be coming in to lunch. Already a tinge of disapprobation could be felt in the atmosphere, and she, too, resented his leaving. It was inconsiderate—he might have known that she would be the odd girl, lost in this desert of selfish couples either engaged or about to be. So she was moping on the broad south porch when the two small sons of her hostess passed, intent on a fishing expedition.

With a sudden determination she sprang up. "Oh Norris, let me go with you!"

"Fishin'?"

"Why, yes."

"But we are going three miles, ain't we, Fred?"

The other solemnly nodded.

"But I just love to walk," persisted Kathleen.

"And you haven't had lunch, and we're in a hurry."

"Who cares for lunch? I don't. We will get up a good appetite for dinner. So just wait a minute and I will be with you."

The boys having submitted to the inevitable, they started out together. Arriving at the creek, Kathleen ensconced herself at the foot of an old oak and gave herself up to the enjoyment of the long spring afternoon. After a while she grew lonely and wished for real companionship. In all the 22 years of her life her heart, she was sure, had remained untouched. Would she ever love? Several men had sworn allegiance to her. There was Archie, who had made no secret of his adoration, and for two years had been her shadow. Until last night he would not take "no" for an answer, but now at last she felt well rid of him. She was—her reverie was interrupted by the boys:

"Oh Miss Kathleen, the fish won't bite, so we're going to East lake. That won't be too far for you, will it?"

"No, but I think I will return home now and let you two go—no, no, you need not come with me. I remember the way perfectly, so good-by and good luck."

"You just follow the creek till you reach the road and then you will be all right," called Fred, as he reluctantly followed Norris in another direction.

Relieved to be entirely alone, Kathleen walked slowly through the warm spring sunlight, while every step brought fresh enjoyment from the sweet scented earth. After going a long way she observed a very high board fence surmounted by several strands of barbed wire. A little farther on were large gates and, just within, a queer looking little house. She wearily wondered what it was and passed through the gate, seeking to be put upon the right path home.

Within the house two men were talking when they were interrupted by a tired voice:

"Pardon me, but I fear I have lost my way. Can you tell me where I am?"

The man nearest stared at her, removed his hat, and said: "This is the reservation for the new Woodlawn cemetery and the road takes you to the village where you can get a car to the city."

"But I do not want to go to the village or to the city. I am staying with Mrs. Victor Vance. Can you direct me to her house?"

The other man then came promptly forward. "I am George Devlin, Mrs. Vance's brother, and am on my way there now if you—"

"Oh, I'm so glad. I've known you a long time, so, if you are ready, let's go at once," interrupted Kathleen.

"Can't we get a rig?" asked Devlin, turning to the other man. "You look tired," turning to the girl, "and it's three miles to my sister's by the road."

"No, there ain't any team about here," said the man.

Kathleen's spirits visibly drooped at this news. But the sexton gave them some help by suggesting a short cut through the cemetery, which would save them about a mile. He warned them that they must be at the other gate by six o'clock, the closing hour.

Kathleen was not so weary now, and each step seemed to revive her natural cheerfulness. Devlin was trying to think where he had met her, for her face was strikingly familiar.

"How serious you are. Some weighty problem must be pressing heavily upon you," began Kathleen, her own talkative self again.

"I fear you will think me ungallant, but I was wondering where I had met you."

"You never met me at all," with a merry laugh.

"But you said you had known me a long time," he urged.

"So I have, but I never saw you until to-day."

"The plot thickens; may I ask how you have known me?"

"Through my friend Marjorie Manning," she replied, watching him keenly.

He seemed unaware of her scrutiny. "So you know Marjorie. You must be one of her college friends, but which one?"

"Kathleen Fielding."

"Then I know you, too," he exclaimed, "both through my sister and Miss Manning."

They were now well into the uncleared part of the cemetery which just here was more like a glade in the woods. He helped her break off great bunches of the azalea, thinking all the while how, like this pretty wild flower, Miss Fielding was with her pink cheeks and fair hair. Her golden brown eyes were aglow with delight in her fragrant burden, and she appeared as happy as a child who had recovered a long lost toy.

"They are the first I've had in so long," she said, "and I used to love them so when I was little. I would play like these bells were ladies. But," after somewhat of a pause, "I suppose you had a little playmate, didn't you?"

"Oh, yes. I played with her, carried her books, and waited on her at all times."

"And she tyrannized over you of course," Kathleen supplemented, gaily.

"No," he smiled, "she was too gentle for that. She just had a way with her even then of ruling with gentleness."

"Even then—you must know her yet?"

"Well, slightly."

"I do believe that I am about to stumble upon a second version of 'An Old Sweetheart of Mine,'" she said gaily.

"No indeed," he replied, "such things only happen in a long while. In reality I think it is 'Whom first we love we seldom wed,' and after all I think it's best, for one's ideals change as one grows older and—"

"Look, the gate's closed," cried Kathleen.

Devlin hastily consulted his watch. "But it is eight minutes before six—I don't understand it."

"Perhaps the keeper is still near. Suppose you call," suggested Kathleen.

Devlin shouted with all his might, but to no avail. He then tried to break off some of the planks by throwing himself against them, but failure was the result.

"I must try again," he said cheerfully; "your friends will be getting uneasy about you, will they not?"

"I suppose so," hesitatingly, as the thought came that after all she was not so eager to return where every one was against her and for the popular Archie, whom her friends had decided was the very man for her. She might have liked him if the others had not tried so hard to make it come to pass. And now she was glad, since she had met Devlin. Then she suddenly blushed with shame as she realized what a fancy she was harboring for this man who was almost a stranger.

"I can climb that big tree, get out on that large branch and drop over the fence," said Devlin, "then I can find some one to open the gate and let you out."

"Let me out! I am going with you."

"Good! But how?" asked Devlin, somewhat puzzled.

"The same way you go."

"An all-round athletic girl," he agreed.

"No, no, don't call me that. It sounds so absurd when I don't look it. Besides, I do those things because I love them, don't you? The woods and the water just call me."

"I see, but few girls understand the call. Most of them follow outdoor sports because it is a fad. Really though, do you think it quite wise for you to try that tree? You might get dizzy."

"No I won't, and we'd better hurry before it gets so late."

"Very well. You go first so I can help you. Just put your foot in my hand and fancy you are mounting a tall horse, and I'll swing you up so you can catch that branch." He was so skillful with his light burden that she went up like a bird and was soon settled on one of the branches.

Devlin scrambled up after her. Cautiously he worked his way out on the overhanging limb to see if it would bear his weight. He was just beyond the fence, ready to swing himself to the ground, when an ominous creak simultaneous with a scream from Kathleen proclaimed that the branch was breaking. Before he had time to think he was on the ground, outside the inclosure, it is true, but with his face scratched and for a moment almost stunned, but Kathleen's voice, asking if he was hurt, caused him to arouse himself and sit up. He could just see her over the top of the fence and through the wires. They gazed at each other in dismay. But gradually the ludicrous picture he presented caused Kathleen to smile and then they laughed till the echoes rang.

"I will go for help and will be back in 20 minutes," said Devlin.

When a turn in the path showed him a well kept public road he waved his hat to her and sang in his fresh voice: "Some day I'll take you home, Kathleen." Then he disappeared.

Kathleen felt lonely. But the novelty of the situation kept her amused, and she wondered if it was merely the rarity of their adventure that made her feel so warmly near to this cheery young man. He was big and handsome, too, and his keen blue eyes were full of laughter and light. Could it be that the man, whom that morning she had feared might not be in existence for her, had at last put in an appearance? She chided herself for her boldness but could not keep her soul from dreaming. Huddling her feet on the broad branch and leaning against the trunk, she glided into a reverie as elusive as the afterglow which lingered in the western sky. After a while she was startled by the cry of a whip-poor-will. Again she listened, but heard nothing except the sighing trees, which seemed to say: "You are alone, alone." She never before knew such terror.

The familiar face of the rising moon brought her companionship, and when she recovered from her fright the reaction came, and with it hot anger against the man who had left her to be a prey to the terrors of the night. Only last night she and Archie were walking in the moonlight and he had told her of his great love. And how had she answered? She knew that she had caused him to leave that morning. Oh, why had she done it? He would even now be looking for her had she not been so unresponsive. And to think of wasting any regard on Devlin! She felt that to see Archie would be the greatest joy on earth. And how she hated Devlin who was, of course, responsible for all this!

After Devlin turned into the main road he walked hurriedly down the pike hoping to meet some one who could direct him to the home of the sexton. So engrossed was he that he was right upon a small store by the roadside before he saw it. Entering hastily he rather startled the proprietor and his son, the latter mechanically asking if he wished anything.

"Yes, I want some help," said Devlin, and related his story, ending with the query if the boy would show him the way to the sexton's house.

Before he could reply another man came into the store and became an interested spectator. "What's the trouble, Scott?" he asked.

The story was retold and both men laughed immoderately.

A trap driving to the door interrupted them and a clear feminine voice called: "Oh Mr. Scott—Why Norris, I was just looking for you boys. But where is Kathleen?"

"Isn't she at home?" The young man on the front seat of the trap lost his absent-minded air and became interested.

"She's in the cemetery," added Devlin's weary voice. The young man on the front seat was visibly startled.

"What do you mean?" Mrs. Vance inquired, paling a little, and then: "Oh, George, how did you ever get so scratched up?"

"We must hurry to the cemetery now and talk after. She is inside and probably half dead from fright by this time."

He hastily climbed into the trap telling the old darky to hang on some way. While Devlin was answering his sister's rapidly put questions the young man on the front seat was driving at a reckless speed in his eagerness to save every moment possible. When they arrived at the gate he hardly waited to check the horses before springing out and rushing to the rescue, beating Devlin by several yards. The disheveled little girl huddled against the iron bars cried out, as she felt his sustaining touch: "Oh, Archie, Archie, I knew you would come to me!"

Several hours later, after their adventure had been laughed over and the adventurers properly fed, Devlin was walking in the garden enjoying his pipe in spite of the lame shoulder and the chagrin he felt when he recalled the ending of the afternoon. What a sorry figure he had cut when he rushed to the rescue only to have the distressed lady give all the credit to another man! He could see that at one end of the porch Kathleen was again in possession of her hammock. And near, very near by, was Archie Hagood, the picture of content. But Devlin was far from contented and his thoughts strayed to Marjorie and lingered there. Ashamed of his unfaithfulness to her in the afternoon, very heartily ashamed of his quarrel with her, in which he could now see his unreasonable attitude, he was in spirit at the feet of his old sweetheart. His restless feet carried him to the pansy bed and he recalled his schoolboy name for her, Heartease. He plucked a dark velvety one that was somehow like her eyes in the moonlight, and held it against his cheek as he went toward the house.

Apples That Sell at Thirty Cents Each

Eastern Oregon grows plenty of wheat, but the grain most before people's eyes is the apple. Hood River apples are said to be sold in Paris at 30 cents apiece, to go upon the tables of millionaires, diplomats and popular actresses. Fruit lands down in the canon of Snake river are really worth $500 to $600 per acre, and people talk of $1,000 and even $2,000 an acre. The idea seems to be that, if you sell 10,000 bushels of apples at a fancy price, you could dispose of 10,000,000 bushels at the same price. Washington and Montana are already competitors in the fruit business, and it is likely that the fruit growers in the end will find that there is only a limited market for the highest priced fruit. Yet nobody can deny that Oregon apples have a beautiful rosy texture, nor that the complexion of the girls is very similar. This is not the result of eating the apples, for of course they are all exported, since Oregonians cannot afford 30 cents apiece for apples. It would appear that the high quality both of the fruit and of the young ladies' complexions is due to the moist climate.

Going Him One Better.

Yeast—Did you ever see a bun-dance on the table?

TOBACCO HURTS THE BODY.

The Nicotine Attacks the Vital Organs as Does Alcohol.

"The effect of tobacco on the human frame is hardly different from that produced by alcohol," says a writer in La Lettura. "Like alcohol, nicotine has its object of attack in the vital parts of the body, alcohol invariably attacking the liver and the kidneys, and through them the heart; nicotine proceeding, on entering the system, to affect directly the action of the heart."

As all smokers know, a certain feeling of intoxication is produced by an indulgence in oversmoking, and with it a sensible acceleration in the circulation of the blood indicated by the beating of the heart and the throbbing of the pulse.

In addition to these symptoms the excessive smoker is conscious of a general sweat upon the forehead and the more senstitive portions of the body, accompanied by enervation, general languor and irritability. All these are sure signs that the nervous system is suffering from nicotine poisoning, and a continuance of the habit, after these conditions have declared themselves, cannot but lead to such physical and mental prostrations as are symptomatic of drug-taking. In many cases the hardening or calcification of the arteries—"pipe-stem" arteries—is to be traced to the fact that nicotine destroys the natural lubricating powers of the gastric juice or saliva, and precipitates, in contact therewith, the mineral properties in the blood, which consequently gives the arterial tubes a hard, chalk-like interior coating, an accumulation of which ultimately renders the arteries almost as brittle as pipe-stems.

Though it is established by physicians that half the dyspeptic troubles common among men proceed from an indulgence in oversmoking, it is not denied that moderation in the habit may have a beneficial effect upon the system, even as certain members of the faculty declare that a moderate allowance of alcohol is good for the system. As Crichton-Brown, the English neurologist, declares, however, advice as to smoking may very properly be taken by any person who wishes to drop, or continue, the habit. There are certain systems which do not easily throw off the effects of nicotine, and the enjoyment derived from a "quiet smoke" is no criterion of its beneficiality upon the body, whatever good may be wrought temporarily upon the mind. The same is to be said of alcohol, for, says the same eminent authority, there are systems which cannot throw off the poisons of alcohol and tobacco, or either, no matter how little they appear to show the effects. There is no doubt, says the neurologist, that there are able-bodied and strong-minded men whose "moods" and irritabilities are solely referable to the fact that they indulge, even with extreme moderation, in alcohol or tobacco. If they avoided them altogether they could boast of perfect health, both of mind and body. In the case of habitual smokers of the weed, it is interesting to note that the Italian writer is of opinion that should they wish to cease the habit, and decide to do so suddenly and abruptly, the effect is as bad upon the system as is the sudden cessation of all alcoholic tonics by those accustomed to consume them. The process of self-denial must be a graduated one, or there is danger in store for the self-abnegant.

HURTS BUSINESS.

The Connection Between Drink and Trade Depression.

Presiding recently at a bazar held at Jarrow, a mining town on the Tyne, Sir Christopher Furness, the great shipbuilder, said that as he traveled there by motor car through mining villages he was struck by the large amount of brewers' traffic there was on the road. That suggested that trade was not in such a depressed state as many of them imagined. He had never before seen so many brewers' drays on the same road. Drink was a serious stumbling block in the progress of the country. As a business man, he said it was impossible to maintain the present position among the manufacturing nations of the world with such a heavy national drink bill.

Such a statement presents a strong contrast to the official reports recently put forth showing that the brewing trade in the United Kingdom is on the downgrade. The exports from Scotland appear to have been practically stationary, amounting during the first three-quarters of the year to 124,887 barrels, as compared with 124,118 barrels in 1907.

To Prohibit Drinking Among Students

The faculty of Michigan university has adopted resolutions aimed at the different drinking clubs. This is in line with the action of other colleges and universities in suppressing a most dangerous usage. Many great educational institutions are legislating against the drink evil, as it affects students and the general well-being of issues under their control.

Shows Big Increase.

Last year the prohibition vote in Connecticut was 5,113 out of a total vote of 189,903—2,000 more than the no-license elements have ever polled in that state.

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY

The Fireless Cooker.

"You ought to make your wife one of those fireless cookers," advised Neighbor Hawkins, as he leaned against the fence and watched Frank Hassler working in his iris bed. "It's the finest thing going in the summer time when the thermometer is trying to overflow the tube. My wife wouldn't take a lot for her's—I made it out of an old trunk, some asbestos and hay."

"Maybe I will," agreed Hassler, examining a lily bulb.

Mike, the man-of-all-help, listened attentively, but kept his peace.

Neighbor Hawkins went into the house and Mike returned with a second load of rich loam.

"Oi wouldn't do it" said that worthy, shoveling industriously.

"Wouldn't do what?" asked Hassler, looking up from his work.

"Oi wouldn't make yer wife one o' thim fireless cookers. They're a fraud, sir, a fraud!"

"Why, is that so?" interrogated the man of the house, looking quizzically at Mike. "What makes you think so?"

"Oi know it," says Mike, knocking the ash from his pipe and pointing the stem impressively at Hassler. "Oi know it t' be a fact. Mrs. Anderson hez one, sir—and ye know I wor-rked there last summer."

"Yes."

"She hez one that cost a lot of money, a first-class one, b' glory, an' wan day Oi just t'ought I'd try it—and so I took off th' lid and put me hand down into th' stove—

"'Sez I to mesilf, 'It don't stand t' reason that ye kin cook without a fire an', b' gravy, Oi'll see fer meself.'

"'And—d'ye believe me, Mr. Hassler, th' stove was that cold as th' day it was cast! Divil a bit o' heat anywhere!'"

"Is that so?" replied Hassler trying to hide his face in the iris bed. "Is that so?"

"Yis, sor, divil a bit o' heat!"

Who Cares?

Who cares for snow? Oh, I don't know. I like to wander in the vale when all the earth is hid from sight with diamond prisms, pure and white. I like to mould the snowball's sphere and paste it in some fellow's ear! I love to track the rabbit back to brush heaps hidden in the snow to scare him out with crunching boot and see the pesky rascal scoot! I would not hurt the little squirt. All harmless is my joyous quest, quite free from rancor is my fun. I like to see the duffer run!

For Instance.

An Oklahoma man died and his will, disposing of $25,000, was found nailed to the bottom of a washtub. He had quarreled with his only daughter and presumably thought this would be a good place to hide the will from her. N. B.—It was found by the hired girl.

He Knows.

There are some people who just won't like the local editor, no matter what his religion, politics or standing may be. They have made up their minds that they are not going to like him and that settles it. There is another class (Lord pity their poor little shriveled up souls) who have figured it out that the editor is a low down sort of a cuss and not fit for them to associate with, and as to visiting the editor's family, they couldn't for a moment think of such a thing. Try as hard as we may, we cannot overcome these preconceived notions of some people. But we know a few things. We know who likes us, and who don't; we know who appreciates the work we are trying to do, and who don't; we know who encourages and helps us, and who backbites and throws stumbling blocks in our way; we know who charitably overlooks our shortcomings, and who bitterly criticises us for them—in fact we know lots of things that we have never told, and perhaps never will, and we know some people who ought to be mighty glad of it.—Lakewood (N. THE COUNCIL AT JERUSALEM

Sunday School Lesson for May 23, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 15:1-35. Memory verses 28, 29.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"We believe that through the grace of the Lord we shall be saved, even as they."—Acts 15:11.

TIME.—About 50 A. D., as is commonly agreed, though various scholars place it earlier.

PLACE.—Antioch in Syria, and Jerusalem.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

V. 1. "Certain men," perhaps those sent by James (Gal. 2: 12) "came down from Judea." The Bezan text says that these visitors were Pharisees, members of the strictest sect of the Jews. Perhaps they came to investigate rumors of laxity in the church; at any rate, they "taught the brethren" (the verb is in the imperfect, implying continued action,—they kept teaching), "and said, Except ye be circumcised . . . ye cannot be saved." "A very different doctrine from St. Paul's' 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved' (Acts 16:31)."—Rackham.

The Importance of the Question.—The Christian church, during its first 20 years, had spread over Palestine, Phoenicia, Damascus, Antioch, Cyprus and South Galatia in Asia Minor. It was rapidly growing, especially among the Gentiles. The difference that had arisen set off against each other the two great centers of growth, Jerusalm and Antioch. It threatened to divide the Christian churches into two contending and irreconcilable factions. If that happened, it would probably be the deathblow to the young religion, the destruction of the hopes of the world through Christ. Could any matter be more momentous?

V. 2. "They ("the brethren," v. 1) determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them (including Titus, Gal. 2: 1, afterward Paul's companion, a Greek, a man of much ability, who would serve as a specimen of the Gentile converts), should go up to Jerusalem (300 miles away) about this question." Paul went "by revelation" (Gal. 2: 2), which is entirely consistent with the statement that the church sent him.

After much debate, that everyone might express his views, as is proper in a democratic assembly such as all Christian gatherings should be, Peter spoke up. His nearness to Christ and his strong character combined to make him a leader. Moreover, in this case he had had personal experience which placed him on Paul's side—the divine revelation bidding him go to the Gentile Cornelius, and the outpouring of the Spirit upon that convert and his household. It was precisely such witness to the right of the Gentiles to enter the church without circumcision as Paul himself described from his missionary experience. Peter insisted upon it with characteristic vigor, closing with the pointed question, "Why . . . put a yoke upon the neck of the (Gentile) disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?"—the yoke being the minute oppressive rites of Judaism, with the Pharisaic additions, imposed as a condition of salvation. There is only one condition of salvation, said Peter in conclusion,—"the grace (the free gift, unbought by any deed of ours) of the Lord Jesus Christ." As Peter sat down, Paul must have clapped his hands!

The decision embodied in a leter: (1) To clarify and unify judgment in the preparation of it; (2) to guard against slips of memory on the part of the envoys; (3) to prevent misunderstandings; (4) to preserve for future occasions the results of the conference. Capt. Cuttle's advice, "When found, make a note on," applies to all weighty matters.

The reasons for the restrictions: 1. The "pollutions of idols" (v. 20), explained as "meats offered to idols" (v. 29), came to be a sore trouble in the church, and liberty to eat such meat (the meat commonly sold had nearly all formed part of sacrifices) was at a later time claimed for Christians very strenuously by Paul. But until the Gentile churches were confirmed in their new separation from idolatry, it was wise to require them to abstain from whatever might tempt them with memories of the licentious revels which heathenism celebrated in the name of religion.

2. "Fornication," however, was the great sin of idolatry, which "glorified sexual vice with the halo of a sacred sanction."—Schaff. Courtezans were the priestesses of the temples of Venus, and crowds of abandoned women gathered around most of these so-called holy shrines. To this day, sexual immorality is the terrible sin of idolatry, as the missionary annals of Africa, India, China, Japan and the South seas most abundantly show.

3. "Things strangled," meant "the flesh of such animals as were killed in snares, and whose blood was not poured forth."—Gloag. The Jews were forbidden to eat these, as coming under the larger restriction that follows:

4. "Blood" was forbidden the Jews as an article of diet (Inductive Study 7) because blood was a symbol of life, which was to be held sacred, and of sacrifice, which was to be revered. It was the holy token of the remission of sin (Heb. 9: 22). Their most precious religious ideals urged the Jews to abstain from blood; but among the Gentiles it was, in various forms, a delicacy. To abstain from blood would be a little self-denial on the part of the Gentiles, while failure to do so would make it almost impossible for Jew and Gentile Christians to eat together.

MAY CALL ROOT STUFFED PROPHET OF UPPER HOUSE

Disposition To Make Ex-Secretary Of State The Oracle Of The Senate.

The disposition to make Senator Root the oracle of the upper chamber is causing some curious happenings.

Everybody seems to be of the idea that if he can just get Root to be for his proposition the rest of the Senate will have to be for it. The wise ex-Secretary of State doesn't say much. He is quoted as complaining a good deal in private about the way the tariff bill has been made up, but he doesn't do much on the floor that seems revolutionary. However, he did intimate a disaffection with the glass schedule, and that intimation resulted in the sensational story being sent out to the country that Mr. Root had become a recalcitrant, and that he was going to take charge from this time forth and revise things to suit himself.

The Senate always needs an oracle. Allison used to serve the purpose, and when he was gone there was a threat of advertising for a successor. The New York Legislature came along with Mr. Root just in time to avoid this humiliating necessity.

Now they look upon Mr. Root as the oracle, and, of course, the New Yorker has to pay the penalty of such distinction.

Some mean and jealous statesmen have privately indicated the opinion that unless Senator Root be careful he will presently be known as the new "stuffed prophet of the upper house."

The opinion of Senator Scott of West Virginia that the Dingley tariff law is good enough for the country and a revision of the tariff is all nonsense is not a new idea with him. He had it last autumn when he was in the habit of visiting Mr Taft at Hot Springs, Va.

One day he expressed his views to the new Vice-President. They were that the tariff could be revised in the short session of Congress, that there was no use in revising it anyhow, but, if it had to be done, it should be done in a few months while Congress was busy with other matters.

Mr. Sherman heard him through in appreciative silence. Then he said:

"It can't be done."

"Oh, yes; it can," said Scott.

But the subsequent developments have showed that Sherman was right. Moreover, Scott believes that his own theory was right. He always will believe it.

Rear Admiral Lentz, commandant at the Washington Navy-yard, has the reputation at the Navy Department of being the strictest disciplinarian in the service. Shortly after taking up the work at the navy-yard, and before the workmen there had the opportunity to size up the new commandant, Rear Admiral Lehtz was strolling about the yard looking things over in an informal way. He came across several workingmen sitting on a large section of sewer pipe. He spoke to the men pleasantly and asked why they were not at work. One quick-witted fellow remarked that they had been carrying the pipe, but had stopped to rest for a moment. The Admiral nodded and walked away.

A short distance down the path he stopped and looked at the workmen, who, becoming uneasy, saw there was nothing to do but make good their bluff. They picked up the heavy pipe and carried it around a corner of a building, and were about to get back to the shops, when the admiral arrived upon the scene and remarked that the pipe could not possibly be intended for the spot where it rested. The men picked up their burden and sought another resting place, but the Admiral was always at their heels. Finally they became weary and confessed that they had been loafing.

The journey was a good quarter of a mile, and now the men do their loafing in spots where the Admiral is not likely to see them.

The Admiral, as one might guess, is of German extraction. While on a foreign station one of the sailors on board his ship thought he would be certain to get shore leave by making the request in his best German. He did so, and the Admiral, with a decided accent, announced that sailors on his ship were permitted to use only plain United States, and the applicant would be refused shore leave for the ensuing six months.

It is customary in the Senate to call upon the veterans to occupy the chair when the Vice-President leaves the chamber. That unwritten rule has been broken in the case of Senator Elihu Root, who, although one of the newest members, is asked by Vice-President Sherman to preside in his absence.

APPLIES TO PRIMARIES.

Both Parties Must Obey Corrupt Practices Act Says Governor.

In view of contests which have developed in certain counties for judicial or local nominations, a number of politicians have inquired if the Corrupt Practices act affects the primaries in the same manner that it does the general election. Governor Crothers declared that it applied to both, and that Democrats and Republicans alike must obey it.

"Every effort must be put forward by both parties to enforce the Corrupt Practices act, both in the primaries and the general election," said the Governor. "The Democratic party is responsible for the law, and it will live up to it, and the Republicans must do likewise. The law provides the same punishment for corruption in the primaries that it does for corruption in the general election, and these provisions should be thoroughly understood by all before it is too late. While it is true that the law was in effect during the last campaign, I believe that it will be more effective this year, as it provides that if any candidate is elected by corruption the office may be declared vacant. Under this provision all candidates will realize that it is useless to spend money for corrupt purposes to secure an office which may be declared vacant as soon as he is inaugurated.

"In primary campaigns the candidates must file with the clerk of the court a statement of the amount of contributions received by them and also an itemized list of expenditures, just as is done in general elections. The law will be rigidly enforced, irrespective of party or candidate."

The Governor reiterated his desire for the passage of an act providing for direct nominations for all local offices. Under the present primary law the nominations can be made direct or by conventions except in the counties where the Crawford county system has already been adopted.

"The Corrupt Practices," said the Governor, "is simply a beginning in the line of elections free from all possible control, and should be followed by the adoption of the direct system of nominating for all offices.

A number of county Democrats who have recently been in the city have told the party leaders that they propose to enforce and obey the Corrupt Practices act. They say that with their experience in campaigning it is easy to detect the corrupt use of money, and, as the law is on the statute books, they can demand its enforcement. It is pointed out that the Democrats and Republicans can watch each other alike in the general campaign and report violations of the law to the proper officials.

At the meeting of the Democratic State Contral Committee it developed that there is a demand for direct nominations, especially in those counties where there are contests. The choice under the law is vested in the county State central committees.

ORIGIN OF THE RECENT OUTBREAK OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

The recent outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland started from calves used in the propagation of smallpox vaccine virus which had been contaminated with the virus of foot-and-mouth disease, and the contaminated strain of vaccine originally came from a foreign country. These are the conclusions from an investigation made jointly by the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture and the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the Treasury Department, a report of which has just been issued. The investigation was conducted by Dr. John R. Mohler, chief of the Pathological Division of the former Bureau, and Dr. M. J. Rosenau, director of the Hygienic Laboratory of the latter Bureau.

Foot-and-mouth disease was discovered among cattle in Pennsylvania November 10, 1908, and was reported to the Department of Agriculture by the State veterinarain of Pennsylvania. A few days later it was found also in Michigan, New York, and Maryland. In view of the strict quarantine maintained by the Department of Agriculture on imported live stock and the fact that the importation of ruminants from countries where this disease existed was prohibited entirely, the Department considered it highly improbable that the infection was brought in with animals. When, therefore, the disease was traced by inspectors of the Bureau of Animal Industry to calves that had been used for vaccine by a Detroit establishment (Parke, Davis & Co.), and the cases of longest standing were found among these calves, these facts caused Secretary of Agricul-cultural James Wilson and Dr. A. D. Melvin, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, both of whom had gone to Detroit to make a personal investigation of the outbreak, to suspect that the vaccine was contaminated with the virus of foot-and-mouth disease. As the United States Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service was charged by law with the supervision or biological products used in human medicine, that Service was requested to join the Bureau of Animal Industry in making an investigation.

The main facts regarding the outbreak as brought out in the report are as follows: The H. K. Mulford Company of Glen Olden, Pa., imported certain smallpox vaccine virus which was contaminated with the infection of foot-and-mouth disease. In May, 1908, some vaccine of this strain was procured by Parke, Davis & Co., of Detroit. Calves used by the latter firm in propagating vaccine, were sent October 16 to the Detroit stock yards and thence on the same day to a farm near Detroit. On October 20 three carloads of cattle from points in Michigan reached the Detroit stock yards and were put into the pens that had been occupied by the vaccine calves four days previously. Some were sold for slaughter at Detroit, while the remainder were shipped to Buffalo and some were reshipped to Danville and Watsontown, Pa., where the disease was was first observed some days later. The disease spread to various places in Pennsylvania and New York and to one locality in Maryland.

Three seperate series of experiments were made by Doctors Mohler and Rosenau. Young cattle and sheep were inoculated with vaccine virus obtained from both firms. Foot-and-mouth diseases was produced in experimental animals by the use of vaccine of the same strain obtained from both sources, while other strains of vaccine tested gave negative results. The disease was also transmitted from one animal to another through several series, in two instances by natural modes of infection.

The investigation also indicates that the outbreaks of the foot-and-mouth disease in New England in 1902-3 were probably due to contaminated vaccine of Japanese origin from the Mulford Company. While an investigation was made at that time, the results were confusing so that it was not definitely determined that the outbreaks were due to contaminated vaccine virus. In the recent investigation by Doctors Mohler and Rosenau, however, they used animals which had been vaccinated and were therefore immune to vaccinia or cowpox, so that in case the infection of foot-and-mouth disease was present in the vaccine under suspicion the lesions of that disease would not be suppressed or obscured by those of vaccinia. By this method and by means of intravenous inoculation they were able to detect the contaminating infection when it might not otherwise have been discovered.

The fact that the infection was present in the vaccine virus of the Mulford Company for so long a period, but was not transmitted to outside cattle, was doubtless due to this firm's practice of killing its calves after taking the vaccine virus. Parke, Davis & Co., on the other hand, rented their calves and placed them again on the market a short time after the vaccine material was taken. In this way the disease spread from the vaccine stables of Parke, Davis & Co., but not from those of the Mulford Co., although it was the vaccine virus from the latter establishment that infected the former's cattle.

According to Doctors Mohler and Rosenau, foot-and-mouth disease is primarily and principally a disease of cattle, and affects man only secondarily and casually. Children are occasionally infected by drinking unboiled milk during the periods in which the disease is prevalent in the neighborhood, while persons in charge of diseased animals may become infected through contact with the diseased parts or by milking, slaughtering, or caring for the animals. The disease when communicated to man, however, is very seldom fatal, the affectation usually being too slight to come to the notice of the family physician.

As soon as the facts regarding the contamination of vaccine became known the licenses of the two firms involved were at once suspended, all the suspected vaccine virus on hand was destroyed and that upon the market withdrawn, and other measures of a radical nature were taken. The report commends the intelligent and prompt cooperation of the Mulford Company and Parke, Davis & Co. in accomplishing this end. After an examination of every strain of vaccine upon the market it is stated that there is now upon the market no vaccine contaminated with the virus of foot-and-mouth disease. Regulations have been formulated with a view to preventing hereafter the propagation of contaminated vaccine virus. No instance of the transmission of foot and-mouth disease to man through vaccine virus has been recorded, and it is considered doubtful, in view of the tests made, if it is possible to reproduce the disease in him by the cutaneous inoculation commonly used in the process of vaccination.

The recent outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in live stock has been eradicated after vigorous work by the Bureau of Animal Industry in cooperation with State authorities, involving the expenditure of $300,000 by the Federal Government alone. The quarantine on the last of the infected territory was removed April 24.—Report from the U. S. Agricultural Department.

OAKLAND'S CREDIT.

A few days ago Baltimore City sold some municipal securities at $105 and the newspapers of that city made a great plunge over the fact, drawing attention editorially to the high credit of their little old town. Oakland sends congratulations to its elder sister town and draws attention to the fact that away up here on the mountain top municipal securities were sold on Tuesday of this week at the handsome price of $106, netting the town about $2700 in premiums.

MEETING OF THE GOOD ROADS BUILDERS.

Throughout this country there are being hauled over miserable roads by four, six or eight horses or mules wagons of produce which a single team could haul on an improved highway. No nation is rich enough to be as extravagant as the United States is with the time and money wasted owing to bad roads. A statistician has figured that bad roads cost us $250,000,000 a year; that is to say, it would cost us $250,000,000 a year less to haul crops to market over good roads than it now costs. The waste in a single year would build 50,000 miles of highway costing $5000 a mile. A writer in the New York Evening Post, speaking of other advantages of good roads, says:

Bad roads restrict educational facilities, limit the rural free-delivery service and prevent the proper development of social life in the country. Good roads permit of grade schools in the country, extend the rural free-delivery service and check the exodus of young men and women from the farm to the city. Already, in localites where roads have been improved, we see the movement from the city to the farm.

There was never a time when the public generally was so much aroused to the importance of the subject. It is a particularly good time, therefore, to have the meeting of the Good Roads Convention, whose sessions began here yesterday. Marylanders are keenly interested in the subject owing to the fact that the state is just entering upon rather an ambitious scheme of road building. Every mile built has its good influence, and as soon as the people of the whole country understand the economic side of the question there is bound to be a tremendous impetus given to the work. Dozens of states are preparing plans to build roads or have started in to build them, from New York's scheme for an expenditure of $100,000,000 down to Maryland's $5,000,000, and the proceedings of the meeting here will be noted far and wide. The great need of the hour is education of the public to the importance of the subject. Once it understands fully what our neglect is costing, an era of road building will begin which will eclipse any the world has ever witnessed.

Baltimore and Maryland are pleased to welcome the delegates to the Convention and are sure their deliberations will be fruitful in good results.—Baltimore News

THE NEWSPAPER.

Newspapers are accused of distorting the facts. The accusation comes from the Living Church of Milwaukee. It is not to be supposed that this able publication is deliberately misstating a condition; it is evident, however, the editor has been imposed upon. He says: "The crying evil of deliberate distortion of facts in the daily press has reached a magnitude of which few have any conception." If this were true the outlook would be as deplorable as the editor suggests. It not only is not true, but it has not the least shadow of a foundation upon which to rest. No newspaper with which we are acquainted deliberately distorts facts. It may make mistakes, but it is honest. It will be lead into false conclusions, but it is the falsity of poor judgment, not of vicious intentions.

There are good papers and bad papers, but as a whole the press of America is on a high level, inspired by elevated ideals and conscious of the power for good or evil which it exerts, and minded always to exert this power for good. It is the organ of the people and stands closer to them than any other existing institution. The people know and trust the press. They are not obliged to accept its editorial opinions, but they do know that it is constantly striving to give them accurate accounts of the world's doings. From these accounts they can make their own deductions. In the end, when the excitement of the moment is passed, they find that the press has given them the facts clearly and authoritatively.

MR. BRYAN IS STILL THE PARTY SPOKESMAN.

It will be noticed that when there was a big meeting in Columbus, Ohio, on Saturday night, attended by 1600 Democrats to celebrate something or other—though the Lord knows what occasion the Democrats have for celebration—the spokesman of the occasion was Mr. Bryan. His topic was "Watchman, What of the Night?" With that much to guide one, it ought to be easy to know what Mr. Bryan said. Among other things, he claimed that no party since the history of the world had exercised greater influence on national affairs than the Democratic party since he was first nominated.. It might be said in reply that if Mr. Bryan is so potent an influence for good out of office it is a pity to think of putting him in one. But more important than what he said is the presence of Mr. Bryan as the orator of the occasion. Last week he spoke in St. Paul. The other day he was urged to visit Florida and address the Legislature. So it goes. Mr. Bryan still seems to be the Democratic party. Speechmaking and publicity are his business. He could not help the situation if he would. If it continues, as there is every likelihood it will, a condition is bound to develop when once more the party must take him as its standard-bearer. It seems as inevitable as fate.

State Expert Tells of Butter Making.

Showing that Pennsylvania furnishes peculiar advantages for farm buttermakers Prof. H. E. VanForman, head of the department of diary husbandry in the State College School of Agriculture, outlined rules to be followed in order to insure a satisfactory product. He said:

"Milk contaminated by dust or dirt from the stable or flanks of the animals at milking time can never be restored to its original quality. The strainer takes out only the solid mateiral, but cannot remove that which has dissolved to say nothing of the undesirable bacteria resultant from a laxity toward cleanliness.

"Churnings should be made at least two or three times a week, as the older the cream the less excellent the quality of the butter. Separate the cream as soon as possible after milking, and then cool by placing the can of cream in cold water. Don't guess the chill of the water, but use a thermometer, and be sure that it registers a temperature of 50 degrees Farenheit or less.

"Twenty-four hours before churning the cream should be warmed up to between 65 and 75 degrees, and maintained there until a pleasantly sour taste is noticeable, and a velvety, smooth appearance is perceptible. Then cool it down to a temperature of 60 degrees or below, and hold there for a couple of hours before churning. This should give a firm body. The time required to ripen the cream will usually be from eighteen hours to a day, depending on how well the germinating temperature is kept.

"Churning should be done at that heat which will bring butter within twenty to forty minutes, and I have found that it will become firm best between fifty six and sixty-two degrees. Never fill the churn to a third its capacity, and remember that thin cream, sweet cream and cold cream cause difficult churning.

"In working the butter care should be taken to avoid its becoming greasy, neither should the hands touch the butter. A 'V'-shaped table with a lever, one end of which is fastened at the center of an angle in such a manner as to afford an easy movement in every direction, is a very convenient and efficient 'worker.' Shape the butter in rectangular prints of a pound or more; wrap them neatly in parchment paper."

A Speaker from Cumberland.

Decoration Day services at Deer Park will be a pleasant and useful occasion this year. Saturday, the 29th, is the day selected and everything will be spick and span for the occasion.

G. W. Haulenbeek, a veteran of the Civil War, as chairman, has been informed by Captain R. H. Gordon, of the Cumberland Bar, that he will be present as one of the speakers. Captain Gordon is a property owner in Garrett county and often appears in important matters of litigation in Court at Oakland. While at Deer Park on the 29th Captain Gordon will be the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Haulenbeek, as will also Governor Crothers, if his engagements will permit of his presence. Other speakers have been invited.

The cornet band of Deer Park and the base ball team will lend their aid to entertain visitors. The band will play at intervals during the morning exercises and the base ball team will display their skill in the afternoon.

THE MATTHEWS FAMILY.

George Matthews Was the Forebear of the Garrett County Branch.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Quite recently a paper was published in your enterprising journal in reference to the Compton family. It appeared to be interesting and satisfactory to many persons, yet I believe a supplement or addition can with propriety follow it; especially with the Matthews branch of it.

George Matthews was born near Frostburg about 1801. He died July 16, 1889, aged 88 years. His loving wife, Lydia Compton Matthews, survived until February 23, 1908, when she died on the ancient Selbysport farm, aged 91 years, 7 months and 23 days. There were of this suitable marriage thirteen children in all: Eight sons and five daughters—eight still living, four of each sex.

An intelligent daughter writes that there are surviving eight children; twenty grand children, nineteen great grand children and two great-great-grand chil ren, now in the fifth degree.

There is at least one person living who has a gleam of recollection of George Matthews when he was a stage driver; later a tavern keeper, and still further along a merchant at the Little Crossings, and even his marriage to the pretty young Lydia Compton. He became dissatisfied with his former vocations and sold or traded his store to Daniel Smouse of Selbysport for his fine farm, upon which Matthews and his young family located and lived to the end of the lives of the two worthy parents. George Matthews had no taste for office or politics, but he was once County Commissioner for old Alleghany, in the early eighteen fifties. He had a half brother, William Sheetz, once a hotel keeper on the old National road, died in Iowa some years ago in his high-up nineties. There was considerable longevity in this wide family.

In the paper heretofore published there is an error, no doubt typographical, in reference to Henry Compton, the lone surviver of the ancient Robert Compton. He was not a minister, but has two sons: Millard Fillmore, and William who are prominent ministers of the M. E. church of the West Virginia Conference. This correction is made with pleasure with the aid of one of the daughters of Matthews, a very bright intelligent lady of the practical useful order. J. B.

Preacher and Family to Move.

Rev. J. B. Workman and family will move this week from the parsonage of of St. Paul's M. E. Church on Oak street to the residence property of Sheriff Austin Brown on Second street. The parsonage has fallen very much into decay and on Sunday a large portion of the plastering in one of the rooms fell with a crash. In order to thoroughly place the church property in repair it was deemed expedient that the dwelling be vacated, hence the removal of the minister and his family to another house.

Farm for Sale.

This farm contains 182 acres, about 75 acres cleared and under cultivation; four thousand props and some bark and saw timber. Passenger Train Leaves Rail.

Baltimore and Ohio local passenger train No. 6, due here at 10 a. m., was derailed Saturday at Hardman, W. Va., about thirty-five miles west of Oakland at 8:30 a. m. The engine and entire train left the tracks near a standing line of empty house and freight cars. The engine struck the cars, demolishing several and blocking the track for several hours. Luckily the train was just leaving the station and had not gained sufficient headway to overturn any of the coaches. No one was hurt.

Eggs and Chickens

A Pretty Home Wedding.

On last Sunday, May 16, Miss Carrie Lee became the bride of Mr. Charles Wright, both of near Swanton. The ceremony took place at 11:30 a. m. at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George Lee, Rev. Johnson officiating. Quite a number of friends were present, among them being Mr. and Mrs. Harry Comp, of Altamont; Mr. and Mrs. G. O. Sweitzer and son, George, of Swanton; Mr. and Mrs. Hamill Lee, of Blaine; Miss Florence Shartzer, of Oakland; Miss Della Wright, Messrs. McComas George and Walter Tasker. After the ceremony a delicious wedding dinner was given by Mr. and Mrs. Lee. We wish Mr. and Mrs. Wright a long and happy life.

Memorial Day at Friendsville.

Mr. S. J. Thomas, of Sang Run was in the city on business Tuesday.

Ex-Judge John L. Fitzwater, of Swanton, was here yesterday on business.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Moss, of Annapolis, were at Deer Park on Sunday.

Mr. Leonard Shartzer, of Accident, spent a day or two in Oakland last week.

Mr. N. U. Bond spent Saturday evening in Oakland, going from here Sunday to Alexander, W. Va.

Merchant Henry Scherr and Mr. Lloyd Shaffer, both of Eglon, were in Oakland Tuesday night.

Miss Ann Rebecca Bishop, of Kingwood, is in Oakland as the guest of her neice, Mrs. Gilmor S. Hamill.

Mr. John W. Harvey and son, Justice William A. Harvey, of District No. 8, were in Oakland on business last Saturday.

Mr. James O. Cleveland left Oakland Monday morning for Valley Point, W. Va., where he has a contract for plastering.

Charles Vaughn, a former employe in this office but more recently employed at Fairmont, W. Va., is here on a visit to relatives.

Mr. George W. Legge is making some extensive improvements to his dwelling on Second street and the grounds surrounding it.

Miss Katharine Shirer, of Grafton, spent Sunday in Oakland as the guest of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. S. E. Shirer on Alder street.

Mr. and Mrs. James Grimes and son Mr. Jack Grimes, of Pittsburg and Deer Park, were in Oakland yesterday afternoon for an hour or two.

Mr. Oliver Heyward and little daughter, of Bond, were guests on last Wednesday evening and Thursday morning of Mr. and Mrs. James Willison.

Mrs. A. B. Gonder, after visiting her daughter Miss Anna who is a student in a school near Baltimore, returned to her home in Oakland Monday evening.

Miss Nell Browning and Miss DeWitt of Elkins, who spent a week with Garrett county friends and relatives, returned to Elkins yesterday afternoon.

"Judge" Charles E. Hilleary, of District No. 8, was in Oakland Tuesday and yesterday looking after his political fences and attending to business matters.

Mrs. E. Baumgartner and little son who were guests of relatives and friends in Baltimore for two weeks, returned to their home in Oakland last Saturday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. George Shartzer left Oakland last Friday morning for Uniontown, Pa., where they will be guests of relatives for a week. They drove overland from here to the Pennsyvania city.

Mrs. Albert Ashby and children are on a visit to relatives and friends at Glady, W. Va. Before returning to their home in Oakland they will visit relatives at Elk Garden and Bayard, W. Va.

"What is a barbarian, pop?" asked an Oakland boy of his pater the other day. "Well, son," the father replied, "a barbarian is a man who lives in Grafton and is not ashamed to acknowledge it."

Mr. D. Y. Morris, of Kingwood, who suffered an attack of neuralgia of the heart nearly three weeks ago, came to Oakland with his daughter, Mrs. Benj. H. Sincell, on Monday and will remain here until he recuperates.

Bert McCall, the horse trader who has made Oakland his summer headquarters for a number of years, came into town a day or two ago with a large and varied assortment of horse flesh, expecting to remain here until fall.

Claude Brown, of Oakland, Md., deputy sheriff of Garrett county, was in the city a few hours today enroute home from Clarksburg, where he attended the ball game on Monday between Grafton and Clarksburg.—Grafton Sentinel.

Carrie Nation intends to raise chickens now. If she is as successful with them as she is raising—well, what she's been raising—she ought to put aside a little nest egg for her older age. Which is not a pun either as she is reputed to be worth $150,000.

Mr. Thomas B. Wiley, of near Bittinger, was in Oakland Monday, having brought to market about a ton of maple sugar and syrup. Mr. Wiley harvested nearly six thousand pounds of sugar the present season all of which he has disposed of at the market price.

Mr. Samuel R. Harvey, of near Shaw, was in the city Tuesday morning on business. On Saturday, the 29th inst. he will offer at public auction live stock, etc., belonging to the estate of his recently deceased father, Mr. Sampson Harvey, on the latter's farm near Shaw, W. Va.

UNIFORM RANK, K. OF P.

Was Mustered in Tuesday Evening by Col. Russler, of Cumberland.

Tuesday afternoon and evening will ever remain a pleasant one for those of Garrett Lodge K. of P. who joined the uniform rank of the order and were mustered into service at Castle Hall by Col. Russler, of ,Cumberland, assisted by a number of his staff officers who came to Oakland for the purpose on the afternoon train Tuesday and were met at the station here by the local Knights and the Mountain City band. Upon the arrival of the Cumberland visitors the Knights marched to the Oakland Hotel grounds where they spent the interval between trains No. 55 and No. 14 from the west, which brought a number of fellow Knights from West Virginia.

While the number of visitors present upon the occasion was much smaller than expected the interest was none the less apparent as almost every resident of the town was present upon the streets to extend a welcome to the guests of the local lodge.

From the hotel grounds the Knights marched through the principal streets of the town being accompanied by the city band which played some excellent music and then broke ranks at the Castle Hall, where the mustering in details were carried out.

The visitors returned to their respective homes on trains Nos. 7 and 4 Tuesday night.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas J. Peddicord, who spent two weeks with relatives and friends in Howard and Montgomery counties, Md., returned to their home in Oakland last Friday evening. Howard county being Mr. Peddicord's native county he met many oldtime friends there who made his stay among them pleasant.

Those who were present at the Sunday morning service in the Lutheran church last Sabbath were highly edified with the sermon which was delivered by Dr. W. W. Davis, superintendent of the Mountain Lake Park Association, his theme being the exaltation of Christ. Many of the congregation expressed their pleasure with the sermon.

Rev. L. W. Hensley, who spent two weeks or more with Mrs. Hensley at Beverly, West Va., later accompanying her to Baltimore, where the lady underwent a serious surgical operation, was in Oakland a day or two the latter part of last week, going from here to Beverly where he will remain until Mrs. Hensley's condition will permit of her removal from that city to her home

Sugar producers, whose market is usually found in Oakland, especially those who reside in the vicinity of Bittinger, have been unable to reach this point with their product this season on account of the condition of the weather and the consequent almost impassability of the country roads, have been hauling their sugar to Swanton and shipping it from that point by rail to its destination.

Messrs. Fred. A. Thayer and Edwin E. Friend spent Friday afternoon and Saturday morning in Morgantown, W. Va., where they went on business. Mr. Thayer's son Ralph, a student at the University in Morgantown, who suffered a painful injury to his ankle while engaged in a game of base ball two or three weeks ago, is slowly recovering and is able to move around on crutches.

The Mountain Lake Park Association has established agencies and placed in the hands of real estate dealers in many of the cities roundabout advertising matter setting forth the advantages of the Park as a place of residence and offering lots at prices ranging from $200 to $350. An investment in Mountain Lake Park real estate or in real estate located on the mountain at this time will be a paying one.

Dr. Mahlon C. Hinebaugh returned to his home in Oakland Monday night from Baltimore where he had been as a delegate to the medical congress in session inthat city during the greater portion of last week, and where he participated in the opening of a new building erected there recently and dedicated to medical science. Dr. Hinebaugh during his visit to the city underwent a slight operation for the removal of a fatty growth which had formed and affected to some extent his left eye.

There is to be a nation-wide fight on the house fly this summer. The movement is being encouraged by health officers everywhere, and it is hoped to demonstrate that the fly as a pest may be done away with, or at least minimized. But if this is to be accomplished it will be done only by earnest co-operation and recognition on all sides that the common fly is more than a pest—it is a breeder and conveyor of disease. It is pointed out in the pamphlets that are being sent out urging the crusade that the fly feeds on filth everywhere, and like the mosquito, carries the germs of disease from sick rooms. It breeds only in dirt and refuse. If the house is screened and kept clean, the fly will disappear. The discomfort alone caused by the fly is justification enough for a war of extermination. Everyboy knows that much can be accomplished now in isolated cases by taking care to keep the fly out of the house. The conflict is one in which the housekeeper should lead the van. If it is successful much will be accomplished, both for the health and comfort of humanity.

THE DEATH RECORD.

L. M. BEEMAN.

Mr. Lennox Martin Beeman, aged 71 years, died at his home in Gilmore last Thursday afternoon, about 5 o'clock, from a complication of diseases. He had been in poor health for several months but was not thought to be seriously ill until a week prior to his death, when his illness reached a critical stage and he was unable to leave his bed. Deceased was born on South Mountain, Garrett county, in 1838, and during the early years of his life he worked on a farm in Garrett county. Later on he took up railroading and followed that occupation for many years. During the War of the Rebellion Mr. Beeman enlisted in Company C, Second Maryland Volunteers and served with honor until the close of the war, when he was discharged. He is survived by his widow and eight children as follows: Messrs. William and Elijah Beeman, of Gilmore; Mrs. Alexander Rowe and Mrs. William Barnard, of Morgantown, W. Va., and Mrs. Agnes Bear, Mrs. David Sanders and Mrs. Laura and Bertha Beeman, of Gilmore. Also by five brothers, Messrs. Jacob Beeman, of Garrett county, George Beeman, of Barton, and Charles, David and Thomas Beeman, of Lonaconing.—Lonaconing Star.

ASA B. NEWMAN.

Asa B. Newman, a well known citizen of this borough, died at his home on Tuesday forenoon, after a long and painful illness. He was a little past 54 years of age, and death was caused by a complication of diseases. He suffered greatly from stomach derangement, heart disease and dropsy. Deceased was a native of Garrett county, Md., and a son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Henry Newman, who for many years resided on a farm at the foot of Meadow Mountain near the Pennsylvania line. He is survived by a wife, two sons and five daughters. The eldest daughter is the wife of Roscoe Welfley, and the other children are all unmarried and reside at home. Deceased is also survived by the following named brothers and sisters: Norman, of Penn Station, Pa.; Noah, of Garrett county, Md.; Solomon Oberlin, of this borough; John, of Everett, Wash.; Mrs. Geo. W. Garlitz and Mrs Wm. Ravenscroft, of Garrett county, Md.; Mrs. Harvey Livengood and Mrs. A. D. Shoemaker, of Elk Lick, Pa., and Mrs. Wm. Beynon.—Salisbury Star.

JOHN EDMONDS.

John Edmonds, aged nearly eighty-five years, died at his home near Deer Park Tuesday afternoon, May 18th, at two o'clock as a result of the grip, followed by an attack of pneumonia. Mr. Edmonds was born in England and migrated to this country many years ago, first settling in the George's Creek region, later removing to Garrett county, where he engaged in farming. He leaves a widow but no children. Funeral arrangements at the time this went into type had not been made, but it is probable that his funeral will occur today.

REV. JEREMIAH M. MILLER.

Rev. Jeremiah M. Miller, for more than forty years a minister of the German Baptist church, died at the home of his son, Samuel Miller, Esq., near Red House, on Saturday, the 15th inst., aged 78 years and 6 days. The deceased was born and reared in Fayette county, Pa., coming to Garrett county twenty-one years ago, where he has resided continually ever since. Rev. Miller leaves to mourn his departure two daughters and one son, his wife having died a number of years ago. His funeral took place on Monday of this week.

Testimony in the case of the bondholders of the Stever Run Coal Company vs. Capt. J. W. Thompson, of Philadelphia, was taken Tuesday and yesterdey before Court Auditor E. H. Sincell, Esq. Among those who appeared as principals in the case were ex-Congressman Fred C. Leonard, of Coudersport, Pa.; Wm. K. Myers, of Harrisburg, Pa.; Clarence Peaslee, of Williamsport, Pa.; Col. William Thomas, of Pittsburg; Wm. R. Tyler and Capt. Joseph Washington Thompson, both of Philadelphia. Messrs. Renninger & Offutt represent the bondholders in the hearing and Mr. Thomas J. Peddicord is counsel for Capt. Thompson.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. Address Dr. Percival Lantz, Alaska, W. Va. 7-tf

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man marooned by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.—Stephens met a motley crew, to which he was assigned. He gave them final instructions.

CHAPTER V.—They successfully captured the vessel supposed to be the Esmeralda, through strategy.

CHAPTER VI.—Capt. Stephens gave directions for the departure of the craft.

CHAPTER VII.

In Which I Suspect Evil.

Early dawn reached us in sodden gray, the sun a shapeless blob of dull red, with no vestige of its golden light forcing passage through those dense clouds of misty vapor closing us in as between curtained walls. The swell of the sea was not heavy, but the pervading gloom gave to the surrounding water a peculiarly sullen appearance, through which we tore, reckless of accident, at full speed. A new hand was at the wheel, Johnson having gone below an hour since, but I still clung to the bridge, my eyes heavy from peering forth into the fog-bank, my clothing sodden with the constant drip.

Only a few of the men were visible, three or four grouped about the capstan on the forecastle head, and as many more gathered along the lee side of the charthouse. Evidently regular watches were already chosen, and a portion of the crew had been turned in for their trick below. Tuttle himself, clad in wet, glistening oil-skins and looking gaunt and cadaverous, his chin-beard forking straight out over the high collar, was standing aft, beside the fellow who still kept guard over the companion. I moved across to the starboard end of the bridge, and, when he glanced around, made signal for him to join me.

"Not very much chance of any one overhauling us in this fog, Mr. Tuttle," I said, pleasantly. "It would be like hunting a needle in a haystack."

"'Tis as the Lord wills," he returned, rather sourly. "Man proposes, but God disposes. The sun will lift that whole outfit in another hour. How far do you figure we're off shore?"

"Figure it for yourself. We're doing all of 16 knots, and have been for four hours at that speed. With another to be added, even our smoke ought to be below the horizon. We've given them the slip all right, and from now on it's merely a question of steaming to keep ahead. I don't recall anything in the Chilean navy that can overhaul us. What discoveries have you made below?"

He turned his crafty, glittering eyes toward me, twisting the lump of tobacco under his tongue. In some way, beneath the revealing daylight, I became even more distrustful of the man, more conscious of his hypocrisy.

"Not a great deal," his mouth attempting a grin; "except that we've got the crew caged. Everybody was ashore but the harbor watch."

"Then you found the forecastle empty?"

"Nothin' there but dunnage and bilge water; regular sea-parlor, sir."

"And no officer on board?" I asked, scarcely believing it possible.

"None, barring the engineer, so far as I know. The cabin was locked up by your orders, so I let that alone."

"And that, then, is all you have discovered, is it, Mr. Tuttle?"

He shifted his long legs, but made no effort to turn and face me.

"Well, I guess that's about the whole of it," he answered, slowly, as though deliberating over the choice of words. "Only I'm a bit puzzled about some things what don't look just right. We started out, as I understand it, to run off with a Chilean warship named the Esmeralda, a schooner-rigged steam yacht. That was the contract, wasn't it, sir?"

I nodded, gravely, wondering what the man could possibly be driving at.

"That was my understanding," his nasal tone becoming more pronounced and disagreeable. "And somehow what we've got here looks just a bit odd. This here is a schooner-rigged steam-yacht all right, an' I guess the tonnage isn't very far out of the Esmeralda class, but we haven't found a blame Chilean on board—two Swedes, a Dutchman, two Kanakas, an' a bloomin' English engineer."

"Well, what of that?" I broke in impatiently. "You know as well as I do that the entire Chilean navy is filled with foreigners."

"Sure," he coincided, with a swift, questioning glance toward me; "that's all true enough, sir, but I never saw a whole crew of those beggars an' no Chilean bossin' 'em. But then that's only a part of it. Every one of them small boats down there, an' the life-preservers hangin' in front of the cabin, have got the name Sea Queen painted on them. Dam' if it ain't, here, too, on this tarpaulin."

I bent over the rail looking down at the lettering he pointed out, yet with no feeling of uneasiness.

"Beyond doubt, that was the yacht's name before the Chilean government purchased her and renamed her Esmeralda for their service. She was bought from English parties, I've heard. Probably the new owners have found no opportunity to repaint the name."

Tuttle drew forth a red bandanna and blew his nose, his voice more sullenly insolent as he resumed speech.

"Glad ye take it so cool, an' maybe yer right. However, it looks dam' odd to me."

I glanced aside at the wheelman apprehensively. The fellow was gazing straight ahead of him into the rapidly thinning fog. It was the manner of the mate more than his words that impressed me.

"See here, Mr. Tuttle," and I dropped my hand rather heavily on his sleeve, "kindly explain exactly what you are driving at. Do you intend to insinuate that we have made a mistake in the dark, and run off with the wrong vessel? Why, man, that is impossible. We are sailors, not landlubbers. Both of us have had chances to see the Esmeralda, and you certainly knew where she was moored yesterday."

"Well, when I come to think it over, I don't feel quite so everlastingly sure about that. The mind o' man is mighty deceitful," he admitted, slowly. "You see, I never saw her any closer than maybe a mile, an' even then she was half hid behind other shippin'. Of course I took notice of her outline an' rig, but I didn't pay much attention to details. To-night we was all of us excited, an' colors don't show up much in the dark. Now, her funnel is painted red, an' unless I'm a liar the Esmeralda's was black with a yaller stripe round the top. You see, Mr. Stephens, we kept in pretty close under cover all yesterday, an' maybe they hauled the Esmeralda up to the government docks, and run another boat into her anchorage."

I laughed aloud, not in the least impressed with his argument.

"A very likely story that there were two vessels in that harbor so near alike as to deceive all of us."

He remained stubbornly silent, evidently unconvinced, plucking at his chin-beard.

"There is a certain way of settling the matter," I went on, decisively, "that is, by an examination of the papers in the cabin. Take charge of the bridge, and I'll run down and clear up this affair beyond any further controversy. We may even have one of the ship's officers stowed away there, sleeping off his late celebration. If there is, he's due for a rude awakening. Keep the yacht's head as she is, and I'll be back directly."

I was aware that he watched me closely as I descended the steps, but felt little interest in such surveillance. That we could have been guilty of so serious an error as he suggested was beyond possibility. Nevertheless the mere suspicion was irritating, leaving me filled with a vague unrest. It was quite true that I might have been deceived. I realized that, because I had enjoyed no opportunity to observe the Esmeralda in daylight, and no occasion to study her lines with care at any time. To me she had appeared merely as an extremely graceful vessel, interesting to the eye of a seaman. But Tuttle and his crew must have known the truth. If we were, indeed, on board the wrong vessel, it was from no innocent mistake of the darkness, but rather the result of deliberate plan, the full purpose of which was beyond my comprehension. I swore savagely under my breath, even as I laughed sarcastically at the vague suspicion, aroused largely, as I well realized, by my increasing dislike of the ex-whaleman. The wrong ship? Why, the very conception of such an accident was grotesque, ridiculous, beyond belief! It was the hallucination of a fool. One of the men assisted me to unbar the slide across the companionway, and, bidding him stand by ready for a hail, I started below, my fingers on the brass rail, my feet firm on the rubber-lined stairs.

These led into as handsome a sea-parlor as ever I remember gazing upon. Everything was effective and in elaborate taste, evidencing an expenditure that made me stare about in amazement. So deeply did it impress me that I remained there grasping the the rail, gazing about in surprise, hesitating to press my investigations further. Yet this feeling was but momentary, the very desertion and silence quickly convincing me that the cabin contained no occupants. The movement of the vessel, the trampling of men on the deck, and the ceaseless noise of the screw were more noticeable here than forward, and no seaman, however overloaded with liquor he might have been the night before, could have slept undisturbed through the hubbub and changes of the past few hours.

Inspired to activity by this knowledge, and eager to settle the identity of our prize, I began closer examination of that impressive interior, although not entirely relieved from the spell of its royal magnificence. Six doors, three upon each side, opened off from the main cabin. The full-length mirrors occupied the spaces between, and the doors themselves were marvels of decoration and carving. Another, beneath the stairs, led directly into the steward's pantry, and revealed, besides, a passageway leading forward, probably to the lazarette amidships. The others, as I tried their brass knobs, exhibited merely comfortable staterooms, fitted up for officers' use; three contained two bunks each, the others only one. Four of the beds had been carefully made, but the remainder were in disorder, as though quite lately occupied. Everything impressed me as unusually clean and neat, evincing strict discipline. The only desk I noticed was a roll-top affair, securely locked, and with no litter of papers lying anywhere about. This, I figured, was probably the berth of the first officer; the captain's room would naturally be the one farthest astern.

The upright piano, with the high-backed cushioned chairs surrounding it, blocked my view aft, but on rounding these I observed a closed door, which apparently led into a room extending the entire width of the cabin. Never suspecting that it might be occupied, I grasped the brass knob, and stepped within. Instantly I came to a full stop, dazed by astonishment, my teeth clenched in quick effort at self-control. The entire scene burst in upon my consciousness with that first surprised survey—the draped portholes opening out upon the gray fog-bank, the brass bed screwed to the deck, the chairs upholstered in green plush, the polished table with a vase of flowers topping it, the glistening front of a book-case in the corner, the tiger rug into which my feet sank. All these things I perceived, scarcely realizing that I did so, for my one true impression concentrated itself upon the living occupants.

There were two present. At a low dressing table, her back toward me, fronting a mirror, yet with eyes fastened upon an open book lying in her lap, sat a woman. The lowered head yielded me only an indistinct outline of her features, yet the full throat and rounded cheek gave pledge of both youth and beauty. Standing almost directly behind her chair, with short, curly locks, crowned by a smart white cap, her hands busied amid her mistresses' tresses, was a maid, petite, roguish, fluttering about like a humming bird. The latter saw me at once, pausing in her work with eyes wide open in surprise, but the preoccupied mistress did not even glance up. She must have heard the sound of the door, however, for she spoke carelessly:

"I thought you were never coming. What caused you to sail so suddenly?"

These unexpected words, uttered so naturally, served partially to arouse me from the dull torpor of surprise. I clenched my hands, wondering if I was really awake, and stared back into the frightened eyes of the maid, who appeared equally incapable of articulation. Suddenly she found voice.

"It is not ze one, madame," she cried, shrinking back. "Non, non; it is un homme etranger."

"What is that you say, Celeste?" and the other arose swiftly to her feet, the open book dropping to the floor as she turned to face me. Instantly I recognized her, in spite of the long hair trailing unconfined far below her waist—recognized her with a sudden leap upward of my heart into my thoat. There was no semblance of fear, only undisguised amazement, in the dark gray eyes that met mine.

"What—what is the meaning of this strange intrusion? Are you a member of the crew?"

Instantly my cap came off, the thought occurring to me of what a rough figure I must be making in my soaked jacket, with the glistening peak of my cap shadowing my face.

"No, madame;" and I bowed before her. "I am not one of your crew. My—my entrance here was entirely a mistake."

She leaned forward, one white hand grasping the back of her chair, the expression in her eyes changing as she read my face, perplexity merging into faint recollection.

"I—I do not quite comprehend," she confessed at last, changing her speech to a slightly broken Spanish. "You—you are Senor Estevan?"

CHAPTER VIII.

In Which I Begin Discovery.

Stunned by this abrupt disclosure of the extremely dangerous predicament we were in, I found no immediate voice for reply, merely standing there as if petrified, staring at them both, cap in hand, grasping the edge of the door. Their faces swam before me in the gray light streaming through the stern ports; the maid already attempting a smile, as though her fears had subsided, the mistress viewing me in wondering perplexity. She it was who first succeeded in breaking the embarrassing silence.

"But, senor, what does this all mean? Why are you here on board the yacht?"

With strong effort at control I brought my senses together, desperately fronting the disagreeable situation, feeling myself scarcely less a victim than she. If all that I now dimly suspected proved true, about us both were being drawn the cords of treachery.

"I cannot explain, madame," I began lamely enough. "At least not until I comprehend the situation better myself than I do now. It is all dark. I have reason to believe a most serious mistake has been made—one it will be very difficult to rectify. Perhaps I could see more clearly if you would consent to answer a few question. May I ask them of you?"

She bent her head slightly, still gazing directly at me with widely open eyes in which I read increasing bewilderment. I believe she thought me a crazed man, whom she must continue to humor.

"What vessel is this?"

"The steam yacht Sea Queen of Liverpool, owned by Lord Darlington," she announced, soberly, her face and lips white.

"How came you anchored off the government docks?"

"By special permission of the presidente. We were towed into that berth early last evening, after the Esmeralda had been hauled up against the quay to ship armament and stores."

I drew a deep breath, clenching and unclenching my hands.

"Could you tell me if it was known to others that you contemplated anchoring there?"

She hesitated, her lips slightly apart, one hand pressed against her temple.

"It is most important that I learn the exact truth," I urged, earnestly. "I ask from no idle curiosity."

"I am not generally consulted in such matters, senor," she admitted, "but I believe we had been waiting several days for the opportunity to take that position. This is as I have been told."

She seemed to be awaiting my explanation, striving to be courteous, yet with her impatience slightly evidenced by the continual tapping of her foot on the rug. But I was not yet through with my questioning.

"Were no officers left on board last night?"

Her gray eyes widened.

"Certainly yes; the first officer and the engineer were in charge when I retired. The others, with the majority of the crew, had gone ashore at sundown to enjoy the fun. But why do you ask, senor? Are these not on board now?"

"I regret being compelled to answer no. Only the engineer, three of the harbor watch, and some Kanaka firemen have been found. I have discovered no trace of the first officer."

"Then—then he must have rowed ashore with two of the men!" she exclaimed.

"How chanced you to be left here alone?"

She hesitated, her hands clasped on the chairback, her bosom rising and falling tremulously. Yet finally she forced her lips to reply, as though thus seeking the quickest way of clarifying the situation.

"We were all invited to the palace of the presidente, to listen to the speeches and view the fireworks. Lord Darlington was greatly interested, and most desirous of attending. The unfortunate scene which occurred at the hotel early in the evening left me, however, with so severe a headache that I begged to be allowed to remain here alone with Celeste. At first both Lord Darlington and mamma refused to depart without me, but when the presidente dispatched his own steam launch to convey the party to the wharf, they decided it would be most discourteous not to attend. Lord Darlington's membership in the house of lords gives him a certain official recognition abroad which he does not care to have lapse. The yacht's captain accompanied them, and no dream of evil befalling those left behind ever occurred to any one of us. O senor, tell me, what does it all mean? What has happened?"

"I presume I must explain," I said, regretfully, "although it is not an easy task by any means. You will have confidence in me, Miss Doris?"

"I shall endeavor to do so," she returned, an increasing coldness in her voice. "But I am Lady Darlington."

"Your pardon; I supposed you to be that gentleman's daughter."

The color swept in a wave of rich crimson into her cheeks, the gray eyes becoming darker.

"Nevertheless, senor, I am Lord Darlington's wife."

Even in that moment of embarrassment and perplexity, when I was scarcely less agitated than herself, this unexpected announcement of such a relationship came to me as a shock. Why it should, what difference it could possibly make, I did not in the least realize, yet I was instantly conscious of the disappointment, of deep regret. The revelation, thus calmly, proudly made, was so unexpected, so destructive of all my previous conceptions, as to seem an impossibility. Could this young, clear-eyed woman be indeed the wife of that grim, inactive, ancient peer of the realm?

"You apparently question the truth of my words," she remarked, coldly observant.

"It was only the natural surprise of a moment, Lady Darlington," I hastened to apologize. "The thought of your marriage had never before occurred to me."

She looked directly into my eyes, her own plainly indignant, yet her words strove to overcome the bluntness of my speech.

"I do not feel, senor, that there can be any necessity for discussing my private affairs with you at present. Enough that I am Lady Darlington, and that I have patiently answered the rather impudent questions you have seen fit to ask. Now, Senor Estevan, kindly enlighten me as to the cause of your intrusion into this apartment, and your presence on board the yacht."

Her tone had changed to imperiousness. This was plainly a command, and, back of the fair face fronting me, I read strength of character and a proud insistence long accustomed to control. It was not fear but disdain that darkened her gray eyes. Her manner begged nothing—it pictured dominant command, the attitude of one who addresses a servant, expecting implicit obedience.

"Lady Darlington," I began, standing directly before her, and reverting to the use of English, so as to be certain of making my meaning sufficiently clear, "whatever explanation I may make cannot be pleasant, but it shall be truthful. It is far better that you comprehend fully the situation we are in—your own peril, as well as my responsibility."

Her expression changed from abbitrary defiance to an amazement not untinged by a sudden development of fear as her hands grasped the chair-back convulsively; but I went on steadily to the end.

"I am not, as you naturally supposed, a Chilean, but a native of North America. My name is Stephens. I was in Valparaiso under most unpleasant circumstances, seeking vainly to escape from the country, and hounded by the secret police because of my connection lately with a revolutionary movement along the Bolivian frontier. The merits of that affair need not now be discussed, but I had become involved in it through certain business connections, and had attained Valparaiso after much hardship, seeking escape by sea. There I discovered every avenue closed against me, and was reduced to a desperate plight. I was in hiding from the governmental authorities when I risked almost certain discovery—last evening. A little later—after you left the hotel—a man who I was led to believe represented the Peruvian government, approached me with a strange proposition, which, however, promised immediate release from my dangerous predicament, and, likewise, a suitable reward for the successful performance of a certain service. I am a sailor, and the particular duty required of me was to be performed upon the sea. I was asked to assume the position of a Peruvian naval captain, incapacitated by sudden illness, in the surprise and capture of a Chilean war vessel, the steam yacht Esmeralda, then supposed to be lying at anchor, poorly guarded, in the outer harbor off the government docks. For that purpose I was presented with a Peruvian naval commission."

My glance wandered from the motionless woman fronting me in such white silence to Celeste, who had sunk back upon the bed, her blue eyes staring at me across the brass rail, evidently experiencing difficulty in translating my rapid English speech.

"I had enjoyed but little opportunity of examining the particular vessel we were thus employed to capture, as I dared not leave the hotel except after nightfall," I continued, more slowly. "Yet I knew her place of anchorage, and that she was a steam yacht of some 700 tons burden, schooner-rigged, with lines promising great speed. Otherwise I relied entirely upon the knowledge of the officers under me. We boarded what I believed to be the Esmeralda soon after midnight, overcame the small harbor watch with little difficulty, captured the engine room, and, by holding a gun at his ear, persuaded the engineer to operate his machinery in our service. The very audacity of the attempt brought comparatively easy success. The main cabin had been secured by my orders when we first arrived aboard, and I came below just now, after all danger seemed far astern, to learn if any officers were hidden away here. I had examined all the other staterooms, finding them empty, and at last opened this door in my quest. Not until I saw you did I in the slightest realize that we were on board the wrong vessel, nor that we were engaged in anything except an honorable adventure of war."

That the hasty details of my story both startled her and impressed her with its truth, was evident enough, yet her lips curled with contempt, and her eyes remained unbelieving.

"How many men accompanied you?"

"A crew of 20, with two officers."

"Peruvians, I presume?"

"No, madam," reluctantly, "hotch-potch dragged from the seven seas."

Her expressive face darkened, her fingers clenching again nervously about the chairback.

"And you really expect me to believe that preposterous tale!" she burst forth, indignation shattering all ordinary bounds of speech. "You must, indeed, think very highly of my intelligence. You—why, you are a sea-robber, a pirate!"

My cheeks flushed at the harsh words. I could feel the surge of blood, yet I met her gaze quietly.

"I have told you the exact truth, Lady Darlington, as I promised," I returned, seeking to speak calmly, "without any real hope that you would believe. Yet I want you to try. It is all bad enough as it stands, without endeavoring to make it appear worse."

She leaned slightly forward, clearly impressed to some extent by the gravity of my manner.

"Then prove it."

"How?"

"By steaming directly back to Valparaiso and delivering up this stolen vessel to its lawful owners."

"That sounds simple enough, but do you realize what our probable fate would be?"

She clasped her hands tightly, pressing them against her breast.

"What do I care!" the contempt in her voice grown bitter. "You have done the evil, by your own confession; now you should pay the price. You rescued me once from insult, and I hold the remembrance of that act in your favor. Prove yourself worthy a woman's respect by making amends for this wrong. Take the Sea Queen back now, before it is forever too late, and all I can do, or that my husband can accomplish, shall be done to save you from punishment. Prove to me that your words are not false."

I hesitated, doubt and suspicion rendering me totally incapable of clear thinking before her insistent demand. Her face grew whiter as she marked my silence.

"So you—you lied, then!" the cruel words faltered from between her lips almost unconsciously.

"No, I spoke the truth," I answered, gripping myself sternly, "but I question my power."

"Your power? Why, you just informed me you were in command."

I advanced a step forward, my manner respectful enough, yet she half shrank back from my approach and brought the protection of the chair between us.

"Perhaps I may never succeed in making you clearly comprehend my present position," I said, soberly, "yet I intend to try, because, in truth, I need your assistance as greatly as you need mine. Twenty minutes ago, Lady Darlington, it was true I believed myself to be in absolute command of this vessel. Now I gravely suspect whether I may not be a mere puppet, helpless in the hands of others. As I have already endeavored to explain, it was comparatively easy for me to mistake this yacht for the Esmeralda. They are very much alike, and I had enjoyed no opportunity for closely observing either. But it is impossible for me to conceive how the others of my party could have innocently made such an error. What project they may have had in mind I cannot even guess, but I believe now the Sea Queen was deliberately captured, and that I have been decoyed into the leadership of an act of piracy. If so, then I am only one man pitted against 20. What I may accomplish I have at present no means of knowing. I must see the others, endeavor to discover their secret purpose, and learn whether or not I possess any real authority on board. Lady Darlington, do you at least comprehend what I mean? Do I make it clear to you that I am in a position scarcely less perilous than your own?"

"You—Why, You Are a Robber, a Pirate!"

With lips parted and hands clenched over her heaving breast she stood silent, apparently deeply aroused by my earnest appeal, yet totally unable to repose full confidence in me. Yet her very hesitancy was to me an encouragement.

"You certainly have every reason to doubt me at present, madam," I urged, with increased confidence, "yet I mean to prove myself worthy your trust by deeds rather than words. Will you consent to do as I wish, at least for the moment?"

She did not appear to know what she had better do or say, her glance wandering in uncertainty from my face to the questioning eyes of the maid. The latter leaned forward with some eagerness.

"Surely it is best to say oui, madame; ze man has ze look honorable," her hands gesticulating despair. "An' on ze whol' ship zere was no one else to help us."

"As you say, Celeste, there is no choice;" and Lady Darlington's gray eyes again sought mine reluctantly. "I sincerely desire to repose complete confidence in you; to believe you worthy. What is it you wish us to do?"

"Merely to remain where you are, beyond the observation of others, until I can ascertain the exact truth of our situation. So soon as I learn this, I shall return with the information. Will you accede to this?"

She lowered her head slightly, in silent acquiescence, and, still facing them both, I backed out of the room and closed the door.

Increase of Suicide Due to Insecurity of the Rich and Envy of the Poor.

By MAX NORDAU, Famous Author.

WE seek in vain today among the rich a feeling of SECURITY in regard to their wealth and of simple enjoyment of it. Neither do we find among the poor that PATIENT ACQUIESCENCE in the poverty which appears so inevitable and unchangeable to human eyes.

AN UNDEFINED FEAR OF APPROACHING DANGER HAUNTS THE MAN OF WEALTH. He sees a menace in the present condition of men and affairs, indistinct, but none the less real, so that he has come to look upon his possessions as a loan that can be demanded from him without reprieve from one moment to another.

The POOR MAN IS CONSUMED BY ENVY AND GREED of the wealth of the privileged few. Neither in himself nor in the existing arrangement of the world and society, as he has learned to understand it, does he discover any convincing reasons for the fact that he is poor and hence EXCLUDED FROM THE TABLE OF LIFE'S PLEASURES.

THE RICH MAN IS DREADING, THE POOR MAN IS HOPING AND WORKING TO BRING ABOUT, A CHANGE IN THE PRESENT CONDITION OF PROPERTY OWNERSHIP.

What do we learn from the domestic politics of each of all the civilized countries of Europe? The CONTRASTS ARE BECOMING SHARPER all the time, the struggles between the political parties more violent. The conservative adherents of the existing state of affairs are gradually dying off, and one of these days there will be none left of them upon the surface of the earth.

THERE WILL REMAIN ONLY REACTION OR REFORM—THAT IS TO SAY, REVOLUTION FORWARD OR BACKWARD. THE FORMER WISHES TO RECALL THE PAST, THE LATTER TO HASTEN THE FUTURE, AND THE REACTIONIST HATES THE PRESENT FOLLY AS MUCH AS THE REFORMER.

This universal mental restlessness and uneasiness exert a powerful and many sided influence upon INDIVIDUAL LIFE. A dread of examining and comprehending the actualities of life prevails to a frightfully alarming extent and manifests itself in a thousand ways. The means of sensation and perception are eagerly counterfeited by altering the nervous system by the use of stimulating or narcotic poisons of all kinds, manifesting thereby an instinctive aversion to the realities of appearances and circumstances.

INDIVIDUALS AND SOCIETY TRY TO DROWN THEIR SORROWS IN A FLOWING BOWL, AND HAND IN HAND WITH THIS INSTINCTIVE SELF DECEPTION AND ATTEMPT AT TEMPORARY OBLIVION OF THE ACTUAL WORLD GOES THE FINAL PLUNGE INTO ETERNAL OBLIVION. SUICIDES ARE INCREASING IN ALL THE HIGHLY CIVILIZED COUNTRIES.

Not Enough Patriotism In America.

By Governor JOHN A. JOHNSON of Minnesota.

THERE is too much partisanship and NOT ENOUGH PATRIOTISM in America. As long as we have a constitution we will have two great parties. Every man should belong to one of these parties—not because his father or his grandfather belonged to it, but because after due thought he believes it is the right party.

THERE IS MUCH WRONG DONE OWING TO DISRESPECT FOR THE LAW. THE LAWS MAY BE SUFFICIENT, BUT THEY ARE NOT EFFICIENT. THE GREATEST THING IN OUR OWN COUNTRY IS LAW, AND IT IS THE GREATEST THING IN THE UNIVERSE.

Law has been and ever will be. In our country the law is made for the BENEFIT OF THE PEOPLE—to protect the poor, to enable the workman to collect his wages and to maintain him in the enjoyment of his rights under the constitution.

Disrespect for the law by public servants and corporations drags the respect of the law in the dust. In many cases the law is MORE SEVERE ON THE INNOCENT than on the guilty.

Briber Is More Guilty Than the Bribed.

By President CHARLES W. ELIOT of Harvard University.

MUCH lawlessness in this country has been justified on the ground that the managers of large businesses must PROTECT THE INTERESTS OF THE OWNERS by procuring favorable legislation and preventing the enactment of unfavorable laws. It is said, for instance, that directors must procure some wished for legislation by any necessary amount of BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION because the interests of the shareholders, for whom the directors are in some sense trustees or managing agents, require the enactment of this legislation and that when purchasable members of a legislature introduce laws adverse to the interests of a given corporation they may properly be bought off because, again, the INTERESTS OF THE SHAREHOLDERS REQUIRE PROTECTION.

THE BRIBER AND THE BRIBED ARE BOTH LAWLESS, BUT THE WORSE OF THE TWO IS THE BRIBER.

Men Are Worse Gossips Than Women.

By Mrs. LILLIE D. BLAKE, Lecturer and Author.

IT is the MAN WHO GOSSIPS, not the woman. The men of this country are, on the whole, pretty good fellows, but women are the silent sex.

MEN HAVE LONG LAUGHED AT WOMEN FOR BEING THE TALKING SEX, BUT THEY ONLY CALL THEM THE TALKING SEX TO HIDE HOW MUCH THEY TALK THEMSELVES.

ONCE ON A TIME.

MY baby clambers to my knee,
And when her daring climb
Is done she settles down and says,
"Now, 'Once upon a time,'"
And so I pause a moment while
I search my meager store
Of oft told tales, and then I start
"Once on a time" once more.

"Once upon a time," I say,
"There was a hungry fox,"
And then I wander on and on
And tell of all the flocks
Of geese and ducks and hens he ate,
Feet, feathers, heads and wings,
And tell of all the mice he caught
And all the other things.

And everything he ever killed,
Chicken or goose or dove,
I separate from all the rest
And make a story of
Until the stories told stretch out
And all the evening through
And bring great peace and joy to the Wee lass I tell them to.

"Once on a time," I sit alone
When baby is in bed,
When I have tucked her snugly in
And kissed her tousled head
And think of all the things she said
And her cute ways, and then
I tiptoe to her side and kiss
Her tousled crown again.

Some time she will grow up, and all
Her charming baby ways
Will be remembered only with
The joys of other days,
And I will think of times she climbed
Upon her daddy's knee
And we two sat there in the dusk
As cozy as could be.

And I'll remember every tale
I tell so glibly now,
And I'll remember all she says
And how she laughs and how
She looks into my eyes when she
Has dared that fearful climb,
And I will sigh at the thought of joys
I knew "once on a time."

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The Park never looked better at this time of the year. The shade trees planted by the ladies of the Civic Club have most all died but are beingtaken up and replaced by others which will be more likely to grow.

Mr. W. C. Dunnington has leased the Mountain Lake Park Hotel for a period of three years. Mr. D. will also conduct the Chautauqua Hotel.

Rev. N. L. Baumgardner came to the Park Monday. He is the guest of Mr. Luther Selby. Mrs. Baumgardner is receiving treatment in a hospital in Wheeling, W. Va.

Mr. H. B. Carroll, of Piedmont, W. Va., was here Tuesday looking after his cottage.

Prof. R. G. Richardson and son Carl, of Piedmont, W. Va., spent Tuesday here, remaining over night. Tuesday evening he invited a friend to his cottage to engage in a socieal game of checkers. We will let the Professor announce the result.

Among the cottages rented for the season since our last report we note the Allen cottage on G street and the Spitzer cottage on I street.

Mrs. Allie Haymond, of Fairmont, W. Va., arrived here Tuesday and is putting her large cottage in order for the season.

Dr. Gonder is putting his drug store condition for the summer trade. The store will be opened for business in a few days.

Hon. Philip Willett is still confined to his cottage, suffering from rheumatism or gout.

The Columbian hotel and Haydenhurst and Crane cottages are being painted.

Messrs. John D. Hayden and Harry Callis are putting the light plant and wiring in order for the season. Light will be turned on June 1st.

Superintendent Echard has nearly completed the work on the streets and has done it well It was feared that his new son would take up so much of his time that he would not have the streets ready for the opening of the season, but our fears were groundless.

Prof. F. E. Rathbun will deliver a lecture in the M. E. church Friday evening at 8 o'clock, under the auspices of "The Invincibles." Frank should have a full house.

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

In making this report the Commission has thought well to make the following explanation: Under Chapter 788 of the Acts of 1906, and Chapter 370 of the Acts of 1908, the Court House Commission has received from the Board of County Commissioners the sum of $78,000.00 and also an additional sum of $40.00 from A. D. Naylor & Company, in all $78,040.00.

This amount would have fully covered the original contracts and cost of work and materials which were $75,479.31. But as the work progressed and the building developed there were certain changes and additions, which in the opinion of the entire Commission it was eminently proper, wise and ultimately economical to make, these additions were therefore ordered, their aggregate being $4,470.00. They included stone columns in the porticos, marble floor and copper roof, all of which added materially to the character and durability of the building.

On account of the above mentioned changes, there was a deficit of $1,909.31. This amount has been met by the Board of County Commissioners and paid to the Court House Commission, and makes the total cost of the New Court House to Garrett County $79,949.31.

We feel this moderate for such a substantial and handsome structnre.

NOTICE TO TAXPAYERS!

This is to notify the tax payers of Garrett county that the Annual Levy for 1909 has been made and published, and to call their attention to the following abstract Section 45, Chapter 366, Acts of 1890, relating to the discount to be allowed and the interest to be charged on all tax bills.

"All county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of the levy thereof, and on all county taxes paid on or before the 1st day of September a discount of 3 per cent. will be allowed, and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. The Treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the tax bills for county purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt given for taxes so paid. But the discount shall not be allowed unless the whole amount of state and county are paid when same is made.

W. E. HOLLINGER, Treasurer.

INSPECTED PROPOSED NEW ROUTE FOR STATE HIGHWAY

Two Members of the State Road Commission Visited Oakland Saturday.

The proposed good roads improvement to be undertaken in Garrett county by the State Highway Commission, when that body will expend a total sum of $238,000 within the borders of Garrett county for the improvement and maintenance of a series of highways, this sum being Garrett's proportionate share of the $5,000,000 appropriation authorized by the last General Assembly of Maryland, has at last taken definite form, as on Saturday last two members of the Commission, Hon. John M. Tucker, chairman of the Commission, and Hon. F. C. Hutton, a member of the Commission, E. H. Wroe, of the State engineering corps, accompanied by Messrs. Alexander C. Mason and D. M. Dixon, of Oakland, went over the proposed new route for the road leading along the east slope of Hooppole road and striking the present location of that road at or near Thayeruille.

The members of the commission were taken to the Browning farm in a carriage and from that point they returned to Oakland afoot, traveling the proposed new route in that manner.

The object in seeking another location for the Hooppole road was to secure a better grade and in this avoid the numerous hills on the present road. Upon the return of the members of the Commission to Oakland Mr. Tucker stated that if the new location were adopted the probabilities were that no work could be done during the present year as new surveys and maps would necessarily have to be made and much valuable time would be lost and suggested to the residents of Oakland and vicinity who are interested in the roadway that a meeting be held to determine which route should be adopted. As a result of Mr. Tucker's suggestion a largely attended meeting was held in the court room Monday evening when a resolution was unanimously adopted favoring the present location of the road.

This determination on the part of the residents will facilitate the work of constructing the road and we may expect to see work started within the next three or four weeks.

Work Under Way.

This morning the work of making the proper excavations for the water and sewerage systems of Oakland was begun. The steam ditching machine, shipped here by the contractor to do the excavating, arrived on Tuesday and was unloaded from the car yesterday afternoon.

Subrbribe for The Republican.

JUNE WEATHER

Month Will Be Dry With Many Sharp Electrical Storms.

Peter R. Smith, West Virginia's foremost weather forecaster, has made his guess for next month, which will be published in today's Kingwood Argus, as follows:

June will most likely be short in rain.

On the 1st and 2d a high temperature will be experienced in western parts which will spread and strengthen as it moves eastward, developing clouds and thunder showers in central and eastern parts on the 3d and 4th. At the close of these showers the temperature will be much cooler.

Remember, on the night of the 3d the moon will rise entering the earth's shadow, forming a total eclipse of the moon. The center of the earth's shadow will be reached by the moon at 8:33 here and the breadth of the earth's shadow where the moon enters it is about 7,000 miles.

A storm period will develop on the 9th. The natural forces of the earth reach their maximum strength about the 12th, which is noticeable in the excessive amount of lightning discharged by the clouds in June, relieving the earth of much tension at the surface. The period from the 9th to the 13th will develop many thundershowers in all sections of the country, but the supply of rain is likely to be limited in many parts. After the passage of the wave tha temparature will cool, attended by pleasant zephyrs.

On the 16th, 17th and 18th a wave of threatening storms will be on passage which may relieve some portions of the country from the drouth.

The indications are the sun's eclipse on the 17th chase off the rain factors at this period.

A storm wave will develop on the 22d which may be prolonged with threatening weather to the 25th. The temperature will be very warm and much humidity will prevail in the atmosphere. Intense electrical display will be manifested and also high winds and cyclonic action may attend some of the storms. This period denotes the most sure time in June for general and widespread rains.

A renewal of thundershowers will prevail about the 27th, 28th and 29th. After the passage of this storm wave the weather will be cooler for several days.

Will Gather Old Newspapers and Periodical.

Next Thursday Mr. James O. Hinebaugh will call at the residences of the Oakland people for old newspapers and periodicals with his wagon and haul them to the basement of the Lutheran church where they will be bundled and prepared for shipment to the buyers. The ladies of the Lutheran church who requested householders to preserve their newspapers will be pleased if word be left at this office or with Mr. Hinebaugh so that no delay will be occasioned when he starts on his rounds next Thursday morning.

BARGAINS IN

Fencing Wire and Nails.

Having purchased two cars of Fencing and Nails when the market was at the very lowest point we are prepared to offer these goods at the lowest price they have been in years.

WOOL.

The Wool market is in spleneid shape and we would ask that farmers call us up before selling their wool, as we are prepared to offer the highest market price for cash.

GAS WILL BE HERE JULY 15

Success Has Attended Efforts of Local People In Securing Natural Product

The visit to Oakland on Tuesday by Mr. Howard V. Thomas, of Buffalo, New York, vice president of the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Company, which corporation was granted a franchise several weeks ago by the Mayor and Council of Oakland to lay and maintain their pipe lines within the corporate limits of Oakland, settled conclusively the natural gas proposition which has been uppermost in the minds of every resident of the town and surrounding country for the past several months, and, we are more than pleased to state, the decision of Mr. Thomas was that Oakland will be enjoying the comforts attending the introduction of the gas by July 15th of the present year.

This is Mr. Thomas' second visit to Oakland, his first visit having been made three years ago at which time the preliminary survey of the pipe line from near Gorman was made to Oakland. At that time, while Mr. Thomas was very favorably impressed with the town, yet he was unwilling to have his company bring their product here as he feared it would not be a money making proposition. Now, however, he is convinced that Oakland and the country surrounding it is on the eve of a tremendous development and right here on this mountain top thousands of people will flock within the next three or four years and a market will be open for everything.

While in reality the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Company will own and control the pipe lines and other property entering into the plants for Deer Park, Loch Lynn and Oakland, Md., and Terra Alta, W. Va., a subsidiary corporation known as the Northern Natural Gas Company has been formed and under this name the gas will be marketed in the towns above named.

Tuesday the first car load of pipe for the construction of the main from Gorman towards Oakland, was side tracked at Mountain Lake Park, at which point it was unloaded yesterday. The actual work of building the line will begin on Monday of next week, when men with teams will distribute the pipe along the right of way. The gas will be brought over from Gorman in a six inch main and at a point near Oakland it will branch of into smaller mains, one leading east and the other west. About one hundred men will be engaged in the construction work and Mr. Thomas assured THE REPUBLICAN that by July 15th the work of installing the pipe and making the proper connections in Oakland would be completed. To build the line in its entirety twenty-five miles of mains will be used and twelve miles of service pipes will be installed. The cost will be upwards of $75,000.

While but one car load of pipe has been received as yet the entire quantity necessary has been purchased and will be distributed at the various points along the railroad as fast as it is possible for the railroads to haul it.

Mountain Lake Park will get the gas, there is little doubt, if the residencts at that place make the proper effort to secure it. So far but forty property owners of the more than two hundred have signified their willingness to sign and become consumers. The gas company is desirous of piping its product to that place and the Association, so it is generally reported, is anxious to have the gas brought in, but the property owners generally seem to take slight interest in the project. It has been suggested that as soon as the season opens in the Park that a meeting be held and a plan formulated which will be mutually agreeable to all parties concerned and that an effort be made to interest every resident in the matter.

The success attending the efforts of the Oakland Board of Trade in bringing to the attention of the gas company Oakland's needs and her manifest interest in the gas proposition is another evidence of what may be accomplished by unity of action and earnestness of purpose. The work of bringing Oakland to the front has only begun. Everybody is in harness and Oakland will take front rank yet.

BOUNDARY CASE TO BE HEARD.

Attorney General Straus Gets Consent of Supreme Court.

Attorney-General Isaac Lobe Straus appeared before the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington on Monday and succeeded in having the trial of the suit involving the dispute between Maryland and West Virginia over the boundary on the border of Garrett county, set for hearing October 25. Mr. Straus was gratified at securing such an early hearing.

The case has been pending over 20 years. Since Mr. Straus become Attorney General he has completed the record, covering two books of 1,000 pages each, and has prepared the case for trial.

About 50 square miles of land valued at about $1,000,000, are involved in the dispute.

THE DEATH RECORD.

JOHN ROWLAND WHITWAM.

The many friends of J. Rowland Whitwam will be grieved to learn of his sad demise, which occurred at his home in Keyser, W. Va., on Monday evening, May 24, 1909, at 7.30 oclock.

Mr. Whitwam was the son of the late Ephraim and Helen Whitwam, of Clarksburg, W. Va. He was well known in Oakland, having made his home here for three years while in the employ of the Oakland Electric Light Co. In May 1897 he was married to Miss Alice Baird Lawton, of this place. To this union four children were born, namely, Madge, Samuel, Mildred and Edna. Besides his immediate family, he is survived by his mother, two brothers and four sisters, namely, Charles R. and Wallace Whitwam, of Clarksburg, Mrs. Daisy Morris of Wheeling; Mrs. Pearl Taylor, of Clarksburg; Mrs. Emma Mills, of Bridgeport. W. Va. and Mrs. Clara Brown, of Huntington, W. Va. The funeral will take place from the residence of Mrs. Margaret Lawton, in Oakland, on Thursday morning, May 27, 1909, at 11 o'clock, with interment in I. O. O. F. Cemetery. Friends of the family invited.

Mr. John H. Rafter, of Kitzmiller, was in the city yesterday on business.

STATE TEACHERS.

Forty-second Annual Meeting of the Association.

The next meeting of the Maryland Teachers' Association will be held at Mountain Lake Park, beginning on the evening of June 29th and ending on the morning of July 2nd.

Mountain Lake Park was selected for this year's meeting of the association at the urgent soliciiation of Superintendent E. A. Browning, of Garrett county, because not only of the excellent accommodations in the way of the large auditorium with a seating capacity of 10,000, but the commodious hotels there, beautiful scenery and healthful and exhiliarating climate.

Excellent railroad rates have been arranged from all parts of the State. The hotel and cottage rates by the day or week are also very reasonable.

The program for each day of the meeting has been carefully prepared, which includes addresses by a number of the most noted educators of the State. The music of the meeting will be furnished by the celebrated Ionic Lady Quartette of Baltimore.

All signs point to one of the largest gateerings of teachers in the history of the assocation. Prof. Howard C. Hill, principal of the Allegany High School, Cumberland, is a member of the executive committee and may be consulted by those desiring to attend the meeting regarding railroad and hotel rates, etc. Mr. Hugh W. Caldwell is recording secretary of the association and may be addressed at Chesapeake City, Md.

Oakland Merryland.

John Woodyard, who recently came to Oakland from the vicinity of Frostburg, has rented the Townshend store room on Alder street and is making some alterations for the purpose of opening an electric theatre which will be known as Oakland's Merryland. He hopes to have the alterations completed by Monday night at which time the first entertainment will be given. The shows to be seen there will be clean, moral and high class in every particular. Mr. Woodyard bears an excellent reputation and all visitors to the Merryland will receive courteous treatment.

BOARD OF TRADE COMMITTEES.

List Appointed By President Dixon and Confirmed by the Directors.

At a meeting of the directors of the Oakland Board of Trade held in the editorial rooms of THE REPUBLICAN Tuesday night President D. M. Dixon of the assocation submitted his list of standing committees, and the appointments were confirmed by the directors as follows:

NEW INDUSTRIES.

H. C. Sincell, Chairman; James D. Hamill and Herman Creutzburg.

ROOM AND FIXTURES.

D. E. Bolden, Chairman; E. Baumgartner and Owen Treacy.

STATISTICS.

D. E Offutt, Jr., Chairman; E. W. Helbig and A. G. Ross.

TRANSPORTATION.

David M. Mason, Chairman; G. S. Hamill and Henry A. Rasche

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Henry W. McComas, Chairman; Henry Lauer and William Weber.

ADVERTISING.

E. H. Sincell, Chairman; John E. Legge and E. S. West.

AUDITING.

R. E. Sliger, Chairman; John W. Hart and Arthur Townshed.

CONVENTIONS AND PUBLIC GATHERINGS.

B. H. Sincell, Chairman; J. M. Stanton and Henry W. McComas.

EDUCATION.

Joseph E. Harned, Chairman; Charles Deffinbaugh and King Delawder.

EXECUTIVE.

S. T. Jones, Chairman; D. M. Dixon and W. R. Offutt.

HIGHWAYS AND STREETS.

Truman West, Chairman; Wm. G. Hinebaugh and E. G. Naylor.

LEGISLATION.

E. H. Sincell, Chairman; A. T. Matthews and Austin Brown.

INSURANCE.

J. C. Renninger, Chairman; A. T. Matthews and Stuart F. Hamill.

MEMBERSHIP.

F. A. Thayer, Chairman; Charles Liller and Chas. S. Davis.

MUSICIPAL AFFAIRS.

James D. Hamill, Chairman; E. A. Weimer and F. J. Schroeder.

Among other matters considered by the directors was that of getting into communication with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad officials relative to the condition of the railway property in Oakland, especially the old Glades Hotel site and the grounds surrounding the Oakland Hotel, and endeavor to have the railroad officials place a competent hotel man in charge of the Oakland and operate is as an up-to-date summer hotel.

The adverstising committee was also instructed to gather data for a proposed booklet setting forth the advantages of Oakland and Garrett county.

SCIENCE AND THE FARMER.

The State Agricultural Experiment Station, which is a department of the Maryland Agricultural College, is developing new plans for getting into working touch with the farmers of the state. The director of the Experiment Station, Dr. H. J. Patterson, advocates a system of instruction for the State Agricultural College which will result in bringing the institution into closer and more beneficial relationship with the practical farmers. He is a believer in the agricultural specialist in instruction methods. He declares that the day for the general teacher in agriculture has passed and that those institutions which are keeping pace with the demands made upon them are having their instructors specialize more and more. And he believes, moreover, that those who are engaged in working out the scientific problems of farming should know that the farmer practically—should get his point of view.

There is apt always to be some hiatus between the abstract theory and the practical application of any science. The practical farmer is sometimes disposed to take a somewhat contemptuous view of "book-farming." To an extent, at least, this attitude of mind is caused by the fact that the man reaches conclusions about soils and plants in the laboratory misses some of the actual factors of the farming problem as the practical farmer knows them. The theoretic scientist and practical farmer are constantly getting closer to each other, however. The scientific farmer is no longer an anomaly. The scientific investigator has taught the man behind the plow a few things about intensive farming, and quite as much concerning various economics and the way to apply them.

Bridge Potomac Five Times.

The pipe line by which natural gas will be taken to Baltimore will cross two mountain ranges and will bridge the Potomac five times, it is said. The enterprise will cost $15,000,000 and the Standard Oil Company is behind it.

ARE SPENDING THEIR HONEYMOON IN JAIL

Young Clarksburg Couple Married Here Yesterday Held on Criminal Charge.

Yesterday morning Julius M. Pletenik and Miss Helen Zaruba, of Clarksburg, came to Oakland on train No. 2 and an hour afterwards were married by one of the ministers of the town. About 10.30 o'clock Chief of Police Browning received a message from the Clarksburg chief of police requesting the arrest of the couple on the charge of being accomplices in a robbery occurring at Clarksburg the night previous. Acting on this advice the man and woman were placed under arrest and pending the arrival of the authorities from Clarksburg they were sent to jail by Justice West.

When the arrest took place the bride made a statement to the police officer and Proprietor Frantz in which she claimed that the whole matter was a conspiracy to keep her from marrying the man of her choice and that her stepfather was at the bottom of it.

Last night Mrs. Zaruba, the mother of the bride, accompanied by Chief of Police Brooks of Clarksburg, came to Oakland and this morning an effort will be made by them to take the girl back to her home at Clarksburg. The bride, however, is determined to stay with her husband. The charge that the couple were concerned in the robbery at Clarksburg was only a techinal one and was for the purpose of preventing their marriage, but the telegram was received too late.

The Clarksburg Telegram of last night, throws new light on the story, however, and contains the following relative to the couple:

"Miss Helen Zaruba, the pretty sixteen-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Zaruba, left her home in the East End some time Tuesday night after 11 o'clock, and it is believed she eloped to a Maryland city with Julius M. Pletenik, a former clerk in Mr. Zaruba's bank and store, who was released from jail Tuesday afternoon, and was married to him.

"Pletenik had been in jail awaiting trial in criminal court on the charge of systematically stealing goods from the Zaruba store and bank on Pike street during term of employment there, extending from last December to a few days ago.

"The girl's parents are of the opinion that Pletenik procured a ladder and took Helen through the window of her bedroom on the second floor of their home. The daughter had been accustomed to sleeping with the window of her room closed. Wednesday morning this window was found raised to the top of the ceiling, and the downstairs doors and windows were locked.

"Pletenik had been paying attention to Miss Helen for some time, but Mr. and Mrs. Zaruba did not believe their daughter cared for him. He wrote her numerous letters and postal cards, and while he was in jail he composed several stanzas of poetry and sent them to her.

"The unexpected disappearance of Miss Helen caused a shock of surprise to her many girl friends in the city as she was quite a favorite in social circles.

"The parents declare they will spend their last dollar if necessary to bring the couple back to Clarksburg. If they have been married, the girl's parents will endeavor to procure a divorce as they firmly believe she was unduly influenced into the elopement."

Since putting the above in type and just as this page goes on the press the bride was released form jail and accompanied her mother home on the 9.26 accommodation train. Later in the day the groom will be released, as the charges against the couple with regards to the alleged robbery at Clarksburg were withdrawn.

Off For Europe.

Messrs. Harvey J. Speicher and William Miller, both of Accident, came to Oakland last Sunday afternoon and on Monday left here for New York from which port they sailed on the Muratania yesterday morning for Europe. Points in England, France, Germany and Belgium will be visited by the two gentlemen. Mr. Miller's voyage will be in the nature of a pleasure trip and while in the Fatherland he will be the guest of relatives. Mr. Speicher goes to Europe as a buyer of blooded horses, expeeting to purchase a number of animals for breeding purposes—all of the Percheron strain. These animals he will ship to this country and establish a stock farm at Accident from which point shipments to other parts of the country will be made. Both Mr. Miller and Mr. Speicher will return to the United States about July 1st.

HER LITTLE HEART

By EARL MARBLE

Sweet Mollie, on Memorial Day,
Went out, with blossoms richly laden,
To lay the blooms of dying May—
As sweet as flowers of fabled Aiden—
On graves of loved ones gone before,
"With just a handful," she said quaintly,
"For one who died 'mid battle's roar,"
And dropped them in a manner saintly.

"For Grandpa Gray," she said, as down
Upon his grave she dropped some roses—
"The red for glory and renown,
The white for thoughts as earth-life closes."
And then appeared young Harold Gray,
The grandson of the soldier sleeping,
While o'er her cheek the pink did play,
As from her heart the blood came leaping.

His clasp the maiden's soft hand sought,
The while they stood—half glad, half weeping—
He scattering flowers he had brought
Above the hero in death sleeping.
"'Twas nice you should remember him,"
He said, "by such a loving token."
"A hero," she replied, eyes dim—
"So all the neighbors oft have spoken."

They slowly, sadly turned away,
And soon the two were homeward walking—
Sweet Mollie Dean, brave Harold Gray—
Of things not in their thoughts just talking.
When suddenly "I've lost my heart!"
Her voice leaped upward like a rocket,
And back she made a sudden start—
"My heart!—my little golden locket!"

They backward went, and on the grave
Young Harold found it where 'twas lying,
And said, "I'll keep it," the sly knave—
To keep back tears was Mollie trying.
"O no, dear Harold, not this heart,"
She said, through tears so faintly smiling.
"The other, then?" he said, Love's art
The maiden's beating heart beguiling.

THE FIRE REKINDLED

A MEMORIAL DAY STORY

BY

Claire Wallace Flynn

THE rat-a-tat of the drums and the dauntless voice of the fife began to awaken the quiet streets early in the morning. Adam Roth, brought to his window by the insistent call of the fifes, raised his eyes to the cloudless blue of the spring sky and then let them shift back uneasily to his shabby room.

As the sounds died away, Adam went and stood beside the bed. On it was laid the full uniform of a Zouave, discolored with the smoke of many battles, ragged and worn with the stress of weary marches. Near one shoulder a faded stain spoke of a wound received at Alexandria.

Adam looked long on this uniform, and then, brushing away a mist before his eyes, he whispered the name "Dan!" Dan, the brave brother who had first donned them in '61, who had with unabated love and energy and pride worn them on every Memorial day since the first, had gone to the great "assembly," and only Adam was left.

And Adam! There was no part for him in all these half pleasant, half sad, reunions, these enthusiastic parades through the great city, these glorious awakenings of memories of deeds well done in the past. That was what ate into his soul and blotted out the light in his face. He had been a coward—coward! In those days, when the uniform before him had been a bright red, and the gun, leaning against the foot of the bed, had sparkled and shone, he had failed to answer the bugle call of his country.

The sounds in the street below grew louder, and the sun streamed into the room, sending a sudden riot to Adam's heart. The veins in his temples throbbed like ceaseless threshing machines, separating all the chaff of his long life of failure and cowardice from this strange, burning prayer that sprang up within him, that he might once, only once, go forth in the uniform of the country he loved, to march behind the flag he had failed to protect, to be an American soldier!

He found himself taking off his coat with shaking hands, and, almost before he realized it, he was hurrying into the uniform. He dusted the moth-eaten fez and put it on his head. The worn tassel fell over his ear, and he tossed it back with a new, free fling of his head. The mantle of Dan seemed truly to have fallen upon him, bringing with it the spirit of '61.

A man leading two little boys by the hand pointed him out to the children. "There goes one of those grizzly old fighters, boys. I tell you, they did great work!" The words reached Adam and sent a gleam to his eyes.

With one great throb of his heart Adam stepped into the street and swung into line. The man next to him glanced in his direction, and his face whitened.

Dan Roth! Surely old Dan Roth was dead! The whole post had heard of it nearly a year ago. Who, then, was this silent, mysterious figure, springing suddenly from the crowd and joining them?

"Who are you?" asked the man.

Adam wavered a moment before he answered. The simple query blotted out his cherished dream; perhaps it would make the continuance of his march impossible. But finally he turned and answered:

"Dan Roth's brother."

Suddenly he felt the silent encouragement of a handshake. The veteran meant to be his friend. Then the command of "Forward march!" came to them, and they were off once more, this time flashing warm, triumphant, into Riverside drive. The long march was over.

Beside him stood the color-bearer, holding aloft the tattered glory of the regiment. The words of the orator floated on the quivering air, and the cannon boomed from the gunboat in the river; but all sounds now seemed to come to Adam from a great distance. He was aflame with the spirit of devotion; the darkened lamp of patriotism had been lighted anew in him, and in the whole world there was nothing else.

Presently Adam's kindling eyes fell upon a man among the crowd of spectators, a man whose haggard face and twitching body marked him apart. Rage, wild, unreasoning rage at fate, cried out from all his features. With some fascination Adam noticed that his eyes were fastened upon the flag, or all that was left of it. But what a gaze. His glance was a menace, his look burnt with the hatred of one whose hand is forever set against the insignia of law and royalty.

The ceremonies were drawing to a close. A bugler stepped forward and played the first bar of the "Star Spangled Banner." From his higher place Adam saw the man whom he had been watching push his way to the edge of the crowd, directly facing the flag. The people were singing now.

The man's arm shot out. Something gleamed in the sunshine, something sang in the air above the words "in triumph shall wave," and an old Zouave stumbled and fell forward upon the white stones.

The commander of the post stooped over the fallen man and lifted his head. The man was a stranger to him. He looked at a Zouave standing near, silently questioning him.

"He pushed in front of Peterson, sir, just as that scoundrel fired. He tried to grasp the flag, sir. I guess he saw what the fellow aimed at."

"Who is he?" asked the officer. "And what is he doing here? He is not one of my men."

"He was Dan Roth's brother. We have all heard of him—he was the boy that wouldn't join in '61. But today—he—he—"

The old man knelt down beside Adam. Just below the dim stain on the shoulder of Dan's jacket, the stain which marked that day at Alexandria, there was a new, fresh one. The heart that lay beneath it was at peace.

When We Honor the Heroes of Two Wars

MEMORIAL day, as it was christened by its sponsors, the Grand Army, Decoration day, as the people at large persist in calling it, although chosen by the survivors of the war for the union as a season in which to honor the memory of our country's defenders, comes to us from the southland. It was the women of the south who instituted the custom of placing flowers upon the graves of not only their own defenders—none the less heroes because they died for a mistaken idea and a lost cause—but also upon the mounds that marked the resting places of union soldiers. Realizing the beauty and significance of this conception, the northern people did not long delay in following the example set by the south. In the month of May, 1868, Gen. John A. Logan, then commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, issued an order for the observance by that organization of May 30 as Memorial day—a day to be set apart to the memory of the soldiers and sailors who fell in the war of the rebellion. This particular day was chosen because it was the date of the discharge of the last soldier of the civil war. It is now a legal holiday in all the states except ten.

Until ten years ago it was difficult for those born since the civil war to realize the full significance that attaches to the day that we observe so generally. It is true they can gather from history all the events of that great struggle in which brother fought against brother and son against father, but they can form no adequate conception of the consternation that pervaded the north when the capital itself was threatened. They cannot grasp the import of the victory of Antietam; of the second Bull Run; of the battle of Fair Oaks; of the Wilderness; of the fiercely contested battle—and the decisive one of the war—of Gettysburg, in which 150,000 men were engaged; and scores of other battles in which the blood of heroes stained the soil of the south in that titanic struggle between the states when more than once the fate of the nation trembled in the balance.

Although so many years have passed since the war of the rebellion the American people are not oblivious of the debt which they owe to the men who fought, suffered and died that the nation might live. The recurrence of Memorial day, with its beautiful and pathetic ceremonies, conjures up visions of those dark days of the past when our soldiers in the south were receiving their baptism of blood and fire and their friends at home were waiting in dread expectancy for "news from the front." And when it is recalled that there were four long years of this warfare those who have appeared upon the stage of life since then may be able to form an idea of the magnitude of what is conceded to be the greatest war in history.

While Memorial day has been scrupulously observed in the north for the last 40 years, within the last ten years it has been invested with a new and solemn significance. It will be a reminder that since the close of the rebellion the country has again been shaken with the throes of war—a conflict in which some of its best blood was sprinkled upon the altar of patriotism. As the veterans of '61 assemble to pay homage to their dead comrades, and the muffled drum and wailing fife sound a requiem over the heroes who met death on southern battlefields and in southern prisons, there will be mourning also for the patriots of '98—the young men who, with courage and valor equal to that of their sires, fell by Spanish shot and shell that an oppressed people might be free. When the chaplets are twined and the garlands are woven for those who have listened to the last tattoo they will also be laid upon another generation of American soldiers.

As the rites of the day are being observed in city, town and hamlet, the solemnity of the occasion will be brightened by the knowledge that the country is thoroughly reunited. No sectional feeling nor bitter memories will now or evermore arise to mar the harmony of the occasion. The enmity that was felt by a great portion of the south against its conquerors has been entirely dissipated. And yet it was not the conquering guns of the northern hosts that swept away sectionalism and removed the animosities engendered by that fractricidal strife, but rather the cannon that thundered from the fleets of Spain and the volleys that rattled from Spanish Mausers that welded together in one harmonious nation the north and south. When the call to arms resounded through the land in 1898 the states south of the Potomac vied with the north and the west in responding to the summons to maintain the honor of the flag against a foreign foe, and the first victim of that war was a son of North Carolina. The south, with the rest of the country, can claim the victor's laurel even while her tears bedew the cypress that marks her bereavement.

Memorial day will never lose its significance and interest. The ranks of the Grand Army are becoming depleted with each succeeding year. There will soon be but a corporal's guard of the members left, for they are being "mustered out" at a rapid rate through age, disability and death. But the graves of those who die fighting for the flag will not be neglected. Memorial day will continue to be a day of remembrance. The Sons of Veterans will keep alive the patriotic flame when their sires are no longer able to march to the public room and the cemetery. Then, in turn, the Spanish war veterans will see to it that the memories of their fallen comrades are kept green.

Draw People Closer Together.

The youngest drummer boy who took part in the great war is now in middle life. The youngest soldier who bore arms in it are entering upon old age. If the celebrations of today lack the military spirit of former years, the mellowing memories of the past which it brings up only draw the American people closer together.

The Proper Salute to the Greatest of All the Flags

"There Goes One of Those Grizzly Fighters, Boys."

THE question of saluting the flag has been and is now being agitated extensively, with the laudable object of instilling into every youthful heart that patriotism without which no country can live. Saluting the flag may be new to some, but it is old to this writer. Away back in the '60's, when a tiny child of tender years, upon the death of my mother, my father being in the Army of the Cumberland, I was left in the care of the widow of the late Capt. John Cleves Symmes (of arctic fame), U. S. A.

Mrs. Symmes was the daughter of an army officer, Col. Pelchy, U. S. A., and the widow, first of Capt. Lockwood, U. S. A., then of Capt. Symmes, and was a most heroic army woman. At the time of which I write she was 80 years old, full of vigor and activity. The civil war engrossed her entirely. Everything she could do or say for her beloved union she said and did. Her energies were often directed toward me, and well have I cause never to forget the flag. From the time I could bend my tiny body I was "ordered" to salute it.

Promptly at 9 a. m. we often went on "parade"—that is, we walked out over the old streets of Newport, Ky., generally ending the day at the old barricks (now destroyed), to hear the band at the evening concert.

One of my childish honors was when, twice a year, we went to Cincinnati, where "grandma" received her pension from the government in gold. As we would approach the building on Third street, over which the flag was floating, "Salute the flag, child," she would command. Then she and I would make the French courtesy—she was French—bending from the waist, low, almost to the ground, and in the most profound manner, which seemed to me a kind of funereal performance. It always attracted the attention of surprised people. She never noticed them, but to me it was a real concern which the bright little gold dollar—my part of the pension—could not wholly do away with. Everywhere and under any circumstances I would never fail to salute that flag, and she saw to it that I understood why this act of reverence was rendered.

"It is your country," and later, "it is the union it represents, for which so many have laid down their lives to save."

One day there came a letter to me, all to my own little self, from my father, written on the battlefield of Shiloh. The envelope had a little flag in the left corner and had a narrow border in blue and red around it. Stationery was thus decorated in those war days. He had been wounded slightly in the shoulder and must go to the hospital. He wanted to write to his "darling child" himself, so that if his name appeared among the wounded or killed in the daily papers I might know the truth. While he wrote a large smooth chip of wood served for his writing desk and his back was braced against the huge forest tree from which the chip had been cut by some woodsman when the battle began. This friendly tree protected him as he wrote from the bullets, which were still flying, although the tide of battle had turned in favor of the union.

My father did not write how he had received the wound, but I learned afterward. During the fight—indeed, at the crisis—a standard bearer was shot through the head and he fell to the ground, bearing down the flag with the staff broken in twain. My father, standing near, saw it fall, and rushing to the spot raised the flag and carried it with both hands high as his arms could reach onward to the thickest of the fight. The regiment rallied and followed with all speed, and, alas! was cut to pieces.

My father's cap was shot from his head and he was wounded in the shoulder, but his act, I have been told, helped to save the day.

That impressed me greatly—the fact that my father had risked his life to keep that flag aloft. Surely I thought in my childish brain, as I tried to reason it all out, it must be something very, very great, and it would be a very, very wicked little girl or boy who could ever see that noble banner and fail to salute it.

At that time it was not customary, and few ever did it. Now it is generally observed; the only question raised is, What particular way is the best? I have seen many different forms of salute, and have read of many others, but to my mind there is none sweeter nor quainter than the one employed by a noble old lady and a little child, bowing low from the waist, with the right hand just raised to the forehead, then brought down to the right side in grateful and loving salute to the greatest of all flags—the Star Spangled Banner.

THE SPEECH OF PRESIDENT TAFT AT PETERSBURG

Following is the full text of the speech of President Taft delivered Thursday at the unveiling of the statue of Gen Hartranft on the old line of earthworks at Petersburg, Va.

President Taft said: "My fellow citizens: We are met today on the soil of Virginia to dedicate a memorial to the bravery of the sons of Virginia and the South. We stand here in the center of the bloodiest and most critical operations of the last year of the civil war, only a few miles distant from that dramatic scene at Appomatox between Grant and Lee, which marked the great qualities of the heart and soul of each, and which was the real end of the terrific struggle between the two sections.

"Here, in and about Petersburg, the outwork of Richmond, the home of the Confederacy, were carried on those besieging operation begun late in the spring of 864 and continued with the courage and the tenacity of purpose characteristic of the federal commander for nearly a year, and resisted with the bravery and strategy and wealth of expedient of the Confederate leader until the forces of the South, worn out by the constant assaults and the incessant hammering, were compelled to yield to the greater numbers and the rescources of the north.

"To Pennsylvania, as one of the greatest States of the Union, engaged in the determination to save it, fell the burden of furnishing tens of thousands of men for the struggle in every part of the line of attack, but especially in the Army of the Potomoc was the force of her people and their devotion to the cause felt. Besides her settled columns, she contributed to the Union Army Major General George C. Meade, the commander of the Army of the Potomac; four corps of commanders, Hancock, Humphreys, Birney and Parke, together with Gregg, the commander of the cavalry division, a roster of which she may well be proud. The mine under the Petersburg works which was successfully exploded in the early summer of 1864 was the work of the miners of Pennsylvania, enlisted in the Twenty-fourth Regiment of that State, and the work which was done by them called for especial mention in the dispatches of Gen. Meade. In the early summer of 1864 until the surrender at Appommattox in 1865 there were engaged from Pennsylvania upward of 80,000 men, a larger number than now constitutes the army of the United States.

"Upon the 25th of March, 1865, Gen. Lee determined to make an assault upon the federal besieging lines east of the town, and successfully carried them by attack of a division under Gen. Gordon, only to be ultimately defeated by the resistance offered by Hartranft's two Pennsylvania brigades. These brigades had just been recruited, and might have been expected to yield to the terrific onslaught of the veterans; but, taking on the stubbornness and courage of their great brigade commander, they withstood the battle and turned the enemy and to the martial renown of the Keystone State. It is forty-four years since the battle of Fort Stedman and the victory of the Hartranft brigades.

"In the time which has passed the bitterness of the internecine struggle has passed away, and we now treasure as a common heritage of the country the bravery and valor of both sides in the great controversy. A memorial which marks the steadfastness, the courage, and the soldierly qualities of the forces engaged in defense of the Union finds its true significance and meaning in the corresponding bravery and courage of those with whom the battle was fought. The Army of the Potomac, under Grant and Meade, was seconded and supported by a generous government. Constant reinforcements, generous supplies of food and clothing, needful fuel and shelter, the tender ministrations of physicians and nurses and frequent communication with home and friends—all these abounded in the Union lines.

"It was hardly so with the Confederate forces. Scantly clothed, rarely on more than half rations, and for considerable periods reduced to an allowance of bacon and meal, hardly sufficient to sustain life, the long winter through, their shivering infantry manned the ever-extending siege works and made head against the vigorous assaults of the Union Army until their depleted ranks were no longer equal to the defense of their attenuated lines, and they gave up a contest which by any other soldiers but the tried and seasoned veterans of the Army of Northern Virginia would long before have been abandoned. We could not dedicated this beautiful and enduring memorial to the volunteer soldiers of Pennsylvania with such a sense of its justice and appropriateness had they not been confronted by an enemy capable of resisting their assaults with equal valor and fortitude.

"Pennsylvania's pride must be in the victory achieved by her men against so brave, resolute, and resourceful an enemy, that we can come here today, and in the presence of thousands of the survivors of the gallant Army of Northern Virginia and of their descendants establish such an enduring monument by their hospitable welcome and acclaim, is conclusive proof of the uniting of sections and a universal confession that all that was done was well done, that the battle had to be fought, that the sections had to be tried, but that in the end the result has inured to the common benefit of all. The men of the Army of Northern Virginia fought for a principal which they believed to be right, and for which they were willing to sacrifice their lives, their homes—all, indeed, which men hold most dear.

"As we recognize their heroic servicesothey and theirdescendants welcome the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to the soil of Virginia and join that commonwealth in honoring the services rendered by its gallant sons in the struggle for the preservation of the Union. The contending forces of now half a century ago have given place to a new South, and to n more enduring Union, in whose responsibilities and whose glories destiny we equally and gratefully share."

BELIEVING AND DOING

Sunday School Lesson for May 30, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—James 2:14-26. Memory verse, 26.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"Faith without works is dead."—James 2:20.

TIME.—It is not known when this epistle was written, but probably "between A. D. 40 and 50—not later than A. D. 62."—Hastings' Bible Dictionary.

PLACE.—It was written at James' home, Jerusalem.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

Three disciples named James are found in the New Testament: 1. James the son of Zebedee, sometimes called the Great. He was the brother of John, was very close to Jesus at the crises of his life, and was the first of the twelve to suffer martyrdom (Acts 12: 2).

2. James the son of Alphaeus, one of the twelve apostles, probably a brother of Matthew, who also is called a son of Alphaeus. He is usually indentified with James the Little (or the Less), and nothing is known of his life.

3. James the brother of our Lord, the author of the Epistle.

Luther, mistakenly thinking that, especially in the passage we are to study, it opposed Paul's great doctrine of justification by faith, once called it "a letter of straw;" but afterward he saw his error. "The tone of the whole Epistle is practical, earnest and stern in parts."—Canon Maclear, D. D. Dr. Deems called it "the Gospel of common sense," and (with the Sermon on the Mount) "the most valuable textbook on morals in possession of the world." Roswell D. Hitchcock, LL. D., "once said that the application of the Epistle of James in the region of economy is that which alone can save our civilization, and it is reported of the third earl of Balcarras that he was accustomed to express himself as delighted with the Epistle of James as "the production of a gentleman.'"—Deems. "The structure of the Epistle is altogether informal and unsystematic."—Plumptre. It is one of the seven Catholic Epistles, so called because written to the whole church, to correct common faults and give the comfort and inspiration needed by all in those times of trial.

James has been speaking of those that take credit to themselves for hearing the law and observing the outward forms of religion, while at the same time they bow down before the rich and scorn the poor. In this passage he goes on to insist that all such religion is empty, a mere profession of faith without the deeds that prove it.

Faith, as Paul defines it, "worketh by love" (Gal. 5: 6). Faith, as Luther said, "is a lively, busy, active thing, so that it is impossible for it not to be ceaselessly working good; it does not ask if good works are to be done, but before it asks it has done them, and is ever doing." Such faith does save a man.

But "throughout James's discussion the name 'faith' is taken in a broad and general sense, covering any degree of acceptance of Christian truth."—Prof. Johnstone. James was writing to the Jews of the "dispersion" (Jas. 1: 1). "Men dwelling as those Jews dwelt, in the midst of a heathen population, were tempted to trust for their salvation to their descent from Abraham (compare Matt. 3: 9) and to their maintaining the unity of the Godhead as against the polytheism and idolatry of the nations. They repeated their creed (known, from its first Hebrew word, as the Shema), 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord' (Deut. 6: 4). It entered into the morning and evening services of the synagogue. It was uttered by the dying as a passport to the gates of paradise. It was to this that they referred the words of Habakkuk that the just should live by faith (Hab. 2: 4)."—Cambridge Bible.

Such faith, which was merely outward and formal religion, did some good. It preserved its subject from the defilements of heathenism; but in their place it established a pride and exclusiveness that were almost as bad. Paul distrusted it as much as James, and would have joined in the question, "What doth it profit?"

V. 26. James closes the discussion with a forcible simile: "As the body without (literally, "apart from") the spirit is dead, so faith without ("apart from") works is dead also." "Of our own human wisdom we had been rather inclined to say that works were likest to the body, and faith to the breath or animation thereof."—Ellicott. "But the apostle's view seems rather to be this: Faith is the body, the sun and substance of the Christian life; works (obedience), the moving and quickening of that body, just as the spirit is the moving and quickening principle of the natural body."—Dean Alford. James does not enter into the question which must come first, faith or works. It is perfectly plain that he considers both to be necessary (see also v. 24). So does Paul. There is no contradiction between the two, only a difference of emphasis.

Robertson's illustration is the lightning and the thunder. Effective lightning (not harmless heat lightning) is always accompanied by thunders, as faith is always accompanied by works. It is the lightning and not the thunder that strikes the tree, but never the thunderless lightning. So it is faith that justifies, but never the workless faith.

Archbishop Whately's famous illustration of a boat pulled by two oars, "faith" and "works," and going in a circle when one alone is used, is defective because it implies that faith or works can exist alone

TEMPERANCE PROGRESS.

Part Women Are Playing in the World's Fight on Alcohol.

The heralding of the gospel temperance message around the globe has been conducted with increasing earnestness and vigor by the World's W. C. T. U. during the year 1908, says the Christian Herald. Seventeen gospel temperance missionaries have visited the mission stations abroad, having secured active co-operation in most places, and have been aided by the missionary boards and temperance workers in home churches.

The past year has seen this number increased by several gospel temperance evangelists. Miss Agnes Slack, the able secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., carried great inspiration and suggestion to India early in the year. Through her activities over 600 new members were enrolled in the W. C. T. U. of India; 15 new local W. C. T. unions were formed; the first W. C. T. U. of Ceylon was organized; over 500 men were enrolled in other temperance socities and an organizing fund was inaugurated.

Miss Flora E. Strout, an efficient educator and trained temperance worker from Baltimore, Md., gave up her post as professor in a girls' college to carry the tidings of temperance to Japan. The petition of the W. C. T. U. for non-smoking cars on railroad trains in Japan has been granted by the government during the year.

The great temperance victory in Switzerland has been won. Many public men in France are indorsing the temperance movement. Mlle. Julie d'Aubigne heads the new W. C. T. U. of Paris. Total abstinence sentiment is growing in Germany, where the Students' Temperance league is a strong and growing body. The Norwegian parliament gave the W. C. T. U. an appropriation of $150, and the University of Christiania granted the use of Nobel hall to the leaders for the annual W. C. T. U. convention of Norway in August. The Temperance Association of Swedish Teachers has nearly doubled its membership. It has now almost 1,000 members in 23 local unions. Finland's prohibition law, enacted in 1907, still awaits the czar's signature, but it is thought he will not veto it. Russian women have this year petitioned the duma for local option and the abolition of liquor selling on steamboats and in railroad stations.

The White Ribboners of Cape Colony and the Transvaal have united with other women's societies this year. The Queensland W. C. T. U. is asking for a scientific temperance instruction law; the South Australian union is establishing national W. C. T. U. headquarters, and New South Wales White Ribboners are urging the introduction of the Pollard pledge-parole for drunkenness; New Zealand temperance workers have been working hard in advance of the taking of the triennial vote on the liquor question.

The beginning of a revival of temperance sentiment is heralded in Canada. In British Columbia, the W. C. T. U. is leading a great campaign for local option. Temperance sentiment is strong throughout the dominion.

IT IS A POISON.

Effect of Alcohol on the Physical Organisms Is Bad.

"Is alcohol a poison to the animal organism?" Dr. Williams, a prominent medical authority, says in answer to the question:

"The matter is presented in a nutshell by the professor of pathology at Johns Hopkins university, Dr. William H. Welch, when he says: "Alcohol in sufficient quantities is a poison to all living organisms, both animal and vegetable." To that unequivocal pronouncement there is, I believe, no dissenting voice. Open any work on the practice of medicine quite at random, and whether you chance to read of diseased stomach or heart or blood-vessels or liver or kidneys or nerves or brain—it is all one; in any case you will learn that alcohol may be an active factor in the causation, and a retarding factor in the cure of some, at least, of the important diseases of the organ or set of organs about which you are reading.

"You will rise," adds Dr. Welch, "with the conviction that alcohol is not merely a poison, but the most subtle, the most far-reaching, and, judged by its ultimate effects, incomparably the most virulent of all poisons."

Prohibition Maintained in Iceland.

The referendum on prohibition, ordered by the parliament of Iceland, has recently taken place, with the result that in 21 electoral districts out of 27 the vote was, for prohibition, 7,271; against prohibition, 2,611. In six districts not fully reported, the number of votes is so small that the result cannot be materially altered, so that the prohibition and trading in intoxicating liquors will soon be in full operation throughout the whole country. The prohibition of the manufacture of intoxicating liquors was adopted throughout the country a number of years ago.

Tax Rate Lowered.

The average tax rate was lower in the no-license cities of Massachusetts than in the license cities during each of the five years 1903-1907, according to statistics recently compiled by the Massachusetts No-License league.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, MAY 27, 1909.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Candidates for nomination on the Republican ticket are invited to annonnce themselves through this medium. For this service a flat rate of $5 tor each announcement, covering the publication in this column until the nominations are made, has been fixed. The cash should accompany the order.

FOR HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the nomination for member of the House of Delegates, subject to the decision of the Republican Convention, and earnestly solicit the support of my friends throughout the county. If nominated and elected I promise my best endeavors for the advancement of the interests of the people of Garrett county. W. W. SAVAGE.

Friendsville, March 30, 1909.

"IT IS my duty to take care that the laws are enforced." Defense of Governor Crothers in sending Baltimore detectives to watch for violations of the law in connection with the Republican primaries in Frederick county. Won't somebody get a megaphone and gently notify the law-enforcing Governor that there is "something doing" right along at the City Hall, Baltimore?

SIGNIFICANCE OF DEMOCRATIC VOTES FOR A DUTY ON LUMBER.

The late Senator Hanna, speaking from the standpoint of a life-long Republican and a very practical politician, defined a party platform as something made to get into power on, but not to stand on.

We do not suggest that in refusing to stand on the platform of the National Democratic Convention of 1908 the 17 Democrats who voted in the Senate on Monday for a duty on lumber were imbued with the cynical spirit of Mr. Hanna. We do not suggest that the free-lumber declaration of the Denver platform embodied anything but honest convictions of the Democrats who framed it in committee and the thousand Democratic delegates to the convention who gave it an apparently unqualified indorsement. But it seems to us, in view of the Democratic support in the Senate of a protective duty on lumber and other things, that the party platforms, so far as tariff is concerned, may henceforth be regarded as largely, if not chiefly, Pickwickian in spirit and intent.

It is early enough, it appears, to make sacrifices in national conventions for the "general welfare," to display a noble altruism in party platforms for the "general good." But when it comes to embodying this self-denial in legislative enactments statesmen seem to feel under no obligation to be as unselfish as the platform makers of their party. The altruism of the party convention is tempered by practical considerations, and many Democratic statesmen see a new light. They legislate on the principle laid down by General Hancock, the tariff is a local issue. Seventeen Democratic Senators saw this new light on Monday when they voted against free lumber. North Carolina, Virginia, Alabama, Florida and Louisiana voted solidly for a duty on lumber. Mississippi, Georgia, Texas, Oregon, Maryland, Tennessee and South Carolina furnished one Democratic vote each against free lumber. We suspect the atitude of these Democratic Senators would have been the same if their party had won the Presidential election last year and a Democratic Congress were now revising the tariff. In the case of Senator Bailey, of Texas, there is no doubt, judging from his statement in the Senate Monday, that he would vote for a duty on lumber under any circumstances. Mr. Bailey allows no party convention to dictate the course he shall pursue in Congress. He is a platform unto himself, and he would, he declares, leave the Democratic party before he would let a national convention ram tariff schedules down his throat.

Since 50 per cent. of the Democratic Senators will not stand on their party's platform, so far as free lumber is concerned, and some of them prefer protective duties on other Southern products to free raw materials for the "general good," the platform makers of the next Democratic convention may have difficulty in framing the tariff plank of 1912. There are, however, two ways by which embarrassment may be avoided and harmony established.

The tariff declaration of 1912 may be a collection of "glittering generalities," which may mean anything or nothing; or it may be drawn in sections and recognize the "demands" and the "interests" of every element in the party. It may promise free lumber, for instance, to all Democrats who want untaxed building material. It may promise ample protection for lumber to Democrats who demand protection. Thus the Democracy will have a platform elastic enough for all and every local interest will be conciliated.—Baltimore Sun.

GOVERNOR CROTHERS' MISUSE OF BALTIMORE DETECTIVES.

Governor Crothers has been roundly scored for having sent Baltimore detectives to Frederick county last Saturday to watch for violations of the law at the Republican primary election—and properly so. He is the head of his party in Maryland just as President Taft is the head of the Republican party in the Nation. Under ordinary conditions, where no political considerations are involved, a prudent Executive does not over-ride local officials unless grave conditions exist which are beyond the control of the local authorities chosen by the people to enforce the law. No such condition existed in Frederick county and there is no suggestions anywhere that the local officials either asked or desired his aid. The Governor himself says that he acted at the request of "prominent" Republicans, although he does not name them, and thereby, by his own confession, took sides under cover of his official authority in a primary contest within the Republican party. The Governor smarting under the criticism his action brought forth, says that the Republicans are opposed to the Corrupt Practices Act, good roads and other things which of course is not true. The Republicans stood for a Corrupt Practices Acts for years while the Democrats opposed it. They are for good roads just as earnestly as the Governor or his party with the addition—that in the building of them partisan politics shall be eliminated. The Republicans are opposed to unwarranted meddling in their affairs by a Democratic Governor who is playing politics; Republicans and fair minded Democrats are opposed to Baltimore detectives being used to intimidate Republicans and at the same time encourage the workers of the Governor's party to resort to their old practices. The Republicans do not get a fair deal in the Wilson law counties, nor was it intended that they should. The black line ballot fraud was not intended as a fair deal nor is the sending of Baltimore detectives intended as a fair deal or to secure impartial enforcement of the law. The Republicans will obey the law and they will be guarded this year in every precinct in Maryland to see that the Democrats do the same, and without the use of imported officials.

A DEAD PARTY.

It is some time since we heard from Thomas L. Hisgen, late candidate for president on the Independence League ticket. He still lives, but rises to remark, that the Independence League or Hearst party, is dead and that he will be a candidate for United States Senator from Massachusetts to succeed Henry Cabot Lodge, Mr. Hisgen further informs the public, that the cause of his party's death was "the withdrawal of financial backing." That has proved fatal to numerous parties in their early years.

It must be said for Mr. Hisgen, that he conducted a gentle, well-behaved campaign for the presidency, and he appears to be a man of commendable candor. When he found that his party was dead, he admitted the fact, took leave of the corpse and disposed of it in a becoming manner. Members of some dead parties have persistently declined to perform their duty in this respect. It is discouraging to Mr. Hisgen's ambition to go to the Senate, that all parties in Massachusetts, except the one to which Senator Lodge belongs, are as dead as the one whose demise and funeral obsequies he has just announced.

AN AMENDMENT TRICK.

If the Democrats did not have the serviceable Wilson county law with which to put through their underhand schemes they would be at a loss how to secure even a corporal-guard support for the disfranchisement amendment in some of the counties. Where that iniquitous law is not operative there is not the same opportunity for legerdemain politics. The scheme is a simple one. It is to lose the amendment amid the names of the candidates so that the illiterate vote will not be able to find it and in the general shuffle of marking the complex ballot the amendment proposal will either be unintentionally voted or escape a negative vote.

Such a scheme is, of course, out of the question in Baltimore city and in counties where the Wilson law is not effective. In all such cases the amendments will be printed in a seperate column to follow immediately the list of candidates. While the Democrats may gain some votes for it in the counties where the colored population is large, yet in these Wilson dominated counties their scheme will be met with checks.

It is to be borne in mind that the last legislature amended the election laws as affecting the Wilson counties so that sample ballots and cards of instruction are not posted in the election booths and outside the guard rails. Consequently, there will be no guides for the illiterate voter. This state of affairs is a straw showing which way the Democratic wind blows. It is only by recourse to tricks and devices that the party maintains power in the state, even though with a substantial normal majority in its favor. Rather than substitute clean politics that would invite the confidence of the people it prefers to eliminate by wholesale voters of the opposite party. The amendment trick being planned is on a par with a multitude of other voting tricks in the use of which the Democratic old guard are past masters.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. Taft in his speech at Charlotte called the Federal judiciary "the strongest bulwark that we have in this country to protect ultimately our institutions of civil liberty," and proclaimed as the rule governing his own policy in relation to appointments that "there is no more sacred duty that the Executive has than in the selection of men whose appointment and service on the bench will strengthen it (the Constitution) with all the people at large."

Nothing that Mr. Taft is likely to do as president can be of more importance to the country than his selection of Federal Judges. He has already expressed the opinion that "the greatest question now before the American public is the improvement of the administration of justice, civil and criminal;" but there can be no such improvement unless men who are in sympathy with reformed procedure are named for the bench.

Our courts have inherent powers that are beyond the authority of any Congress or Legislature to change. They have constitutional powers such as have been vested by no other country in such tribunals. No Congress, no Legislature can enact a law abridging the constitutional rights of any American citizen unless the courts acquiesce. No statute can deny justice or work injustice unless the courts co-operate to give it validity. Indeed, the only law that has a practical existence in this country is such a law as the courts will construe and enforce, says the New York World.

Whatever Congress or Legislatures may try to do to diminish the law's delay, the final reform must lie in the judiciary itself, which has the power to interpret what the legislative department has done. Without waiting for legislative action the courts can hasten and cheapen the process of justice by quickening the procedure and by denying appeals that are based on mere technicalities.

While the Federal judiciary, as Mr. Taft says, is the strongest bulwark "to protect ultimately our institutions of civil liberty," it is to the State courts that the average citizen must look for the administration of justice in matters that most immediately concern his welfare. It is not the Federal courts but the State courts that interpret the Constitution and laws of the State in relation to its citizens, and the State laws are those that are closest to the daily life of the people. In a republic there is no more exalted service that any man can peform than to be "a just and upright Judge," whether he be a Federal Judge or a State Judge.

Oakland Hotel Has Not Been Sold.

The report published last week in one of our local contemporaries that the Oakland Hotel had been sold to a syndicate of Washington people, was based upon no stronger foundation than gossip. The hotel is still the property of the B. & O. Railroad company.

Base Ball at Deer Park Saturday.

Arrangements have been completed for a great game of base ball to be played at Deer Park on Saturday afternoon in connection with the Memorial Day services, when the Deer Park team will cross bats with the Terra Alta nine. Indications point to an interesting game between the two clubs. Both have some very good players. All are invited to see the game.

Festival and Lawn Fete.

A festival and lawn fete will be held in the Oakland Hotel grounds on Monday afternoon and evening, May 31st, for the benefit of the Mountain City Band. All kinds of refreshments will be on sale and the public is cordially invited to patronize the affair.

Memorial Day at Friendsville.

Sherman Post No. 11, Dep't of Maryland, will assemble in front of the Lutheran church in Friendsville May 31, at ten o'clock, with the K. of P. The Sabbath schools of all the churches are invited to commemorate this Memorial Day with us. The line of march will be to the M. E. church, where we will be addressed by able speakers.

A liberal donation of flowers will be thankfully received.

A HIGH HONOR FOR JUDGE BOYD.

Degree of of L. L. D. Will Be Conferred Upon Him by Maryland University.

The degree of L. L. D. will be conferred upon Chief Judge A. Hunter Boyd, of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, by the regents of the Maryland University on Monday afternoon next at the commencement exercises of the university to be held in the Academy of Music in Baltimore.

The exercises are those of the medical, dental and law department of the university.

The presentation of the degree upon Judge Boyd will be made by Mr. Bernard Carter, provost of the university.

The conferring of this high degree by the Maryland University is one of rare occurence, and is an evidence of the superior ability and legal attainments of the present Chief Justice of Maryland's highest tribunal.

In Memory of the Late William W. Sweet.

The following is the report of the committee of the Swanton Epworth League appointed to prepare a suitable memorial upon the death of the late William W. Sweet, for many years the leading spirit af the organization:

The departure from this life, May 4th, 1909, of Mr. W. W. Sweet is deeply deplored by the memberso f this League and residents of this community, and in so bereaving a loss this organization is forever deprived of a strong and salutary influence that has not only pervaded its being from the period of incipiency but has gone out with refreshing health and vigor to other orders and classes, civic and religions.

While stricken by a shaft the mortal arm is too short to stay, we have the comforting assurance that our sorrow should be occasioned more for ourselves than for him who, released from pain and freed from care, has entered into the joys of his Lord. ●

In the narrow range of man's vision it presses upon the senses almost unreal that there can be a meeting, such as this, within these walls clustering with his memory without his kindly voice and familiar presence; for as the first and only president of this League to a marvelous degree he impressed his personality upon its acts and history. His was a well balanced mind with a clear judgment elevated to broad conceptions of justice and sweet charity to his fellows. These temporal gifts, fortified by a believer's faith, enabled him under not a few adverse conditions to found and fashion this League which stands to him a monument no foe can either deface or break down. It is no light task to sum up the usefulness, the zeal and the labors of a career crowded in accomplishments and rate and fix them where they belong in life's achievements. No community indebted for one so ready to suppress vice and promote virtue can quickly weigh and accurately estimate its loss when such a citizen is taken away.

For a succession of years his dominant aim has been to cultivate and superintend movements in various branches of the Christian church and awaken in others a burning knowledge for the loftier truths made beautiful to man by a search of the Scriptures. Remembering his examples and his appeals who can say how many seed sown by his hand over ready soil are to spring into the fairest fruit?

Such a visitation from the Supreme Decree closely touches this League, this church and many societies, but more incisively than all, it reaches and wounds those first in his home and heart, and to them we invoke a solace without hope save from Him so lowly in spirit and single in purpose that walking in His mission among men had not where to lay His head.

GEO. OSS, Committee Chairman.

After reading of the above minutes, by the chairman appointed for its preparation, warm and commendatory address were delivered by the Rev. Mr. Brumbaugh, Mr. George Oss, and C. M. Miller. RELLIM.

ASHER GLADE.

At this writing it is cold—almost like winter.

Wm. M. Fike was hauling coal for his lime kiln, last week.

Mrs. Mary A. Evans made a trip to Friendsville one day last week.

Wm. H. Thomas was hauling lime stone part of last week.

Our rural route is certainly proving good as nine hundred to one thousand pieces of mail pass over it each week, so we are informed.

The sickness in general has subsided and some families that have been sick for several months are well again.

MEMORIAL SERVICES IN OAKLAND.

Old Soldiers Will Observe the Day on Monday, May 31st.

As has been previously announced in this paper the members of Crook Post, Grand Army of the Republic, will observe Monday, May 31st, as their Memorial Day instead of Sunday the 30th.

Crook Post invites all other societies, the school children and others who desire to join with them in their parade from the headquarters to the cemetery where the very beautiful ritualistic services of the organizat on will be carried out in full.

The soldiers will be glad to receive and earnestly request, the donation of flowers for the occasion. These may be left at the Townshed store building on Alder street where they will be properly arranged by the ladies who will have charge of this part of the day's program.

Of the many thousands of soldiers who marched a few years ago to decorate the graves of their departed comrades but compartively few remain and these in many instances are so old and maimed that is is with great difficulty they perform the duty imposed upon them, but with loving hearts and tender memories the remnants of those numberless thousands engaged nearly half a century ago in the terrible war that then raged, will continue to make their yearly pilgrimages to the silent cities all over the nation and pay tribute to the memory of their comrades in arms; and for this reason it is properly the duty of every one to march with them.

Mr. Silas O. Wiley, a former deputy sheriff of this county and a son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas B. Wiley, of Bittinger, who has been residing in Elk Lick, Pa., for several years, will leave that place for Waterloo, Iowa, next Tuesday where he will permanently reside.

Mr. W. B. Hutson, of near Sunnyside was in Oakland yesterday and is very much gratified with the work being done on the Oakland-Aurora road by Mr. M. S. Wolf, the district supervisor. Mr. Hutson reports the road as being in most excellent and satisfactory condition and he is a competent judge, as he travels it from three to seven times each week.

Mr. David Durst and son Earle, who spent a week with friends and relatives in Grantsville, returned to their home in Oakland last Saturday evening. Mr. Durst was very much gratified with his visit to his native town and reports that the place is taking on new life. New buildings are being put up in all parts of the town and real estate is booming, many pieces of property changing hands and the spirit of improvement is increasing.

Mr. Jonas C. Beachy, one of the prominent farmers of the Bittinger section of Garrett county, was paralyzed last Tuesday as he was partaking of the noon meal at his home. Mr. Beachy's entire left side was affected and for some moments after he was seized with the attack it was feared that fatal results would follow. He rallied however, and at last reports his condition was considered very favorable by his attending physician.

A very decided improvement in the appearance of the court house grounds is being made by the removal of a portion at least of the unsightly and disproportionate mound of earth heaped up before the main entarnce to the building. This earth is being removed by order of the county commissioners and when the work has been completed a better view as well as an unobstructed one may be had of the entire frontage of the court house from Third street. Clerk A. G. Ross is superintending the work.

State Senator W. McCulloh Brown, of District No. 8, who recently distributed specimen ears of the Leaming corn, the prize winning variety at the last year's meeting of the Maryland Horticultural Society, to many farmers in Garrett county, recently shelled and planted the grains from four ears of the cereal on his farm near Bayard. When shelled the grains filled a half-gallon measure and weighed four pounds. This corn is particularly adaptel to this section of the state as it is early in maturing and the vield is away above the average.

The saloons in Grantsville, Md., our southern neighbor, closed their doors on May 1st. Before the election at which the town was voted dry, it was freely predicted by the "wets" that in case the election was carried by the "drys," nearly everybody would go to Salisbury to do their shopping, where they could also get something to drink. The prediction, however, is not being verified, and there is not the slightest increase of the Grantsville trade at Salisbury stores. Even the trade at Salisbury saloons does not seem to increase worth mentioning as a result of Grantsville being voted dry. Occasionally a few moral and mental degenerates come across the line for booze, but they're usually broke when they arrive here, hence have to sit and stand around the saloons until they are called up to the bars by those who are in the treating mood, and that's the kind of trade that comes to Salisbury from Grantsville, as the result of Grantsville being voted dry.—Salisbury Star.

BIDS WILL ASKED TODAY FOR ROAD CONSTRUCTION

Six Miles of Highway To Be Build On Hooppole Road Location.

Today at two o'clock the State Highway Commission will ask for bids at its office in Baltimore for the construction of twenty-six miles of roads in four counties of the state as follows:

Harford county, six miles; Prince George's county, six miles; Allegany county, eight miles, and Garrett county, six miles.

Of the above the people of Garrett county are interested in all, but more particularly are they interested in the highway to be constructed in their home county. This will be on the present location of the Hooppole Road, beginning at the corporate limits of Oakland and running six miles north to Sand Flat, a distance of six miles where the Tram Road crossing Hooppole leading into Deer Park.

Under the general road law bids will have to be advertised for two weeks before the contract is awarded, hence it will be that long at least before any information relative to the time when the work of construction will begin.

Deer Park on Saturday Next.

The chairman of the Deer Park Decoration Day Committee has extended an invitation to Mr. S. T. Jones, the cashier of the Garrett National Bank, to speak at Deer Park on Saturday morning. It is expected that a great number of people will be present, and the various committees are working to the end that the exercises will be pleasant and profitable.

The following Deer Park young ladies have kindly consented to grace the occasion with their presence, and sing songs appropriate to the day: Misses Sadie and Amelia Thrasher, Grace and Lulu Marley, Nora Specht, Maude Shaffer, Bertha Miller, Rose Browning, Jessie, Minnie and Nelly Reed.

The Deer Park Cornet band will also give lively pieces.

Marriage Licenses.

The following licenses have been ssued by Clerk E. Z. Tower, since our last report:

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man marooned by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.—Stephens met a motley crew, to which he was assigned. He gave them final instructions.

CHAPTER V.—They successfully captured the vessel supposed to be the Esmeralda through strategy.

CHAPTER VI.—Capt. Stephens gave directions for the departure of the craft.

CHAPTER VII.—He entered the cabin and discovered the English woman and her maid.

CHAPTER VIII.—Stephens quickly learned the wrong vessel had been captured, Lord Darlington's private yacht, the lord's wife and maid being aboard. He explained the situation to her ladyship.

CHAPTER IX.

In Which I Learn Our Port.

I sank down into the depths of an upholstered divan without, rested my head within my hands, and endeavored earnestly to collect thought and nerve for the coming struggle. The terribleness of our situation only became more apparent as I considered it in the light of the discoveries already made, and in my understanding of the nature of those with whom I was now associated. Neither Tuttle nor De Nova had ever mistaken the Sea Queen for the warship Esmeralda. It was impossible to conceive that these two trained seamen could have made such an error, or that the men under them could have been so utterly deceived. Tuttle's boat came up directly beneath the bows, with the riding lamps burning brightly and revealing the name; every man aboard must have seen it plainly. Yet what object could have led to so desperate an act of piracy? What part was I destined to play in the final working out of their lawless scheme?

The longer I studied over the problem the more thoroughly did I become mystified and confused. What could these men ever hope to accomplish in this lawless fashion? They must be fools or madmen. This was not the age of piracy; every league of sea was patrolled; every port protected by telegraphic communication. Where could they sail? Where could they expect to land? Where on all the round globe could they hope to go to escape the vengeance of British power on the high seas? What object could possibly inspire them to so reckless an act?

Difficult as my own situation undoubtedly was, apparently helpless among this crew of sea devils, without a man on board in whom I could put trust, it was rendered a thousand times harder by the presence of those two women. In what way could I protect and serve them? I wondered if all the crew forward were in the plot, or were the leaders alone involved? Could I count on finding a single honest sailor in all that riffraff who would stand by me in revolt? There were others on board—the three seamen and the engineer of the yacht's crew, the Chilean officer captured on shore—but they were prisoners, far more helpless even than myself. The longer I thought the darker grew the prospect, the closer the cords of Fate pressed about me. There was nothing to do except to face the conspirators boldly, and thus ascertain the whole truth. I glanced upward at the telltale compass overhead—the vessel's course had already been altered; we were now headed westward, directly out into the broad Pacific.

I met Tuttle at the end of the bridge, clinging to the handrail, his oilskins flapping in the head wind. He never glanced toward me, the cool, studied insolence of the fellow causing me to feel more deeply than ever before his consciousness of power.

"The yacht is several points off her course, Mr. Tuttle," I said, sharply, determined to test him. "May I ask if the change was made by your order?"

He swept one long arm toward the north, and, following the direction of his finger, I dimly perceived a spiral of black smoke barely visible above the horizon.

"I thought we had better sheer off, as there was no guessing who that fellow yonder might prove to be."

I remained silent, watching the distant smudge, and occasionally glancing aside into his imperturbable face. He yawned sleepily.

"I rather guess one of us had better turn in, Mr. Stephens," he suggested finally, "for we'll have to arrange about our watches aft."

"Presently, Mr. Tuttle; we haven't breakfasted yet. Meanwhile I should prefer to understand matters a little more clearly. I've just been through the cabins. None of the yacht's officers are on board."

I could see his thin lips drawn back in a sinister grin, which revealed his yellow teeth.

"The Lord helpeth those who help themselves," he returned, piously, upRolling his eyes. "The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong."

"I also discovered," I went on, angered by such abominable cant, "that this vessel we have captured is not the Chilean Esmeralda at all, but the yacht Sea Queen, owned by Lord Darlington, and flying the English flag."

"The hell you say."

"Moreover, I have not the slightest doubt that you knew it from the first. Now I demand some explanation, Mr. Tuttle. What does this mean?"

He stood leaning back against the rail facing me, the disagreeable grin gone from his lips, his half-closed eyes glinting uneasily.

"Well, what of it?"

"Only that we have committed an act of piracy. Every naval vessel of the civilized world will be used to hunt us down. We shall not be safe on any sea, nor able to land in any port of the globe. If we resist we shall be blown out of the water; if captured, our crime means death. You have deliberately decoyed me into this affair for some secret purpose of your own; you have involved me in your crime, and now I insist upon some knowledge of your plan, and an explanation regarding my future authority on board."

"Oh, you are the captain," sneeringly. "What more can you want?"

"Then, if I am, we will head directly back to Valparaiso."

"Oh, I rather guess not;" and Tuttle's eyes became instantly hard and ugly. "Nevertheless you're captain all right, just so long as you keep the nose of the old girl pointed the way we want her to go."

"That is it, is it?"

"Yes, that's exactly the ticket."

I turned partially aside, glancing toward the wheelman. The fellow was leaning forward over the spokes, evidently deeply interested in our controversy and endeavoring to hear all we had to say. Tuttle followed the direction of my eyes, but with apparent indifference.

"Oh, they all understand about it," he remarked, carelessly. "And now I guess maybe it's about time we gave you the main points to chew on. If you'll step down into the charthouse, Mr. Stephens, I'll fetch some things I want to show you, an' be along myself in a jiffy. Then I'll spin a yarn that'll cause you to come with us willin enough, or else you're a dam' fool."

There was nothing else to do, and I followed him down the bridge steps to the main deck. The charthouse had its single door opening aft, and was a small, plainly built structure painted a dingy gray, with two narrow windows on either side, and just enough space within to contain a deal table, locker, and three rude benches. I sat down upon one of these, filled and lighted my pipe and waited in silence, gazing idly at the chart pinned flat on the table. It was a map of these waters lying off the Chilean coast, and a vessel's course had been pricked upon it from Juan Fernandez to Valparaiso. This did not particularly interest me, and my thought drifted naturally to the woman impatiently awaiting my return in the cabin. What a distressing situation for one of Lady Darlington's birth and refinement! And yet with what dignity of manner had she met the unexpected! It was plain to be seen that hers was a heart of courage, not easily broken under adversity.

And how could I hope to serve her? What would this crew of hell-hounds these merciless sea-wolves, permit me to do? Trans-ship them upon some passing vessel? Put into some isolated island port? This was scarcely likely, for either act would involve the danger of an exposure they would be little inclined to assume. I comprehended already that it would be according to their decision, and not mine. I had been plainly informed how little my control extended over their desires. And whither were we bound? Into what strange seas? Into what species of wild adventure? The utter impossibility of keeping those two concealed below for any length of time was clearly evident. Ship life was far too restricted. Both Tuttle and De Nova would naturally expect to lodge aft, and it was a privilege they could not easily be denied. Yet what would they say, how would they act, when they finally discovered these two unwilling passengers aboard? What was my duty in all the circumstances? It was all a deep, unsolvable mystery, yet out of its mist constantly floated the appealing face of that woman awaiting me below. I could not desert her. I could not consider anything except how I might best serve her interests, best protect her from the contamination of this hell afloat.

Three shadows suddenly darkened the doorway, and Tuttle, accompanied by De Nova and the big seaman named Bill Anderson, entered. The second officer nodded to me in genial fashion, his white teeth gleaming, but Anderson slouched surlily past and dropped heavily on a bench, his coarse bulldog features devoid of all expression, his square jaws munching the tobacco in his cheek. I took notice of his eyes, staring straight out of the window opposite, dull, dog-like, deeply sunken under thatched brows, his skin like brown leather drawn tight, his short red neck, and gnarled hands. Altogether he appeared a repulsive brute, no more easily subdued than a jungle tiger. Tuttle sidled along to the opposite side of the table, upon which he placed a tightly rolled, yellowish-backed paper, evidently a navigating chart. As I watched him curiously, he suddenly pressed the point of his thumb down upon the paper.

"There's our first port, Mr. Stephens," he announced dogmatically. "There, where you see that red cross."

I bent over, startled out of all assumed indifference as I studied the position indicated.

"Longitude 110° 30′ west, and latitude 66° 17′ south!" I exclaimed, scarcely crediting either ears or eyes. "Why, good God, man, that is almost upon the antarctic circle!"

He nodded, running his long fingers through his thin hair.

"Right you are, sir. I guess there won't be no warships a-trailin' after us down in them latitudes; not at this season of the year."

"But there's nothing there!" I continued, staring incredulously at the map. "Nothing but fog and floating ice. There is no land marked within 500 miles."

"Just the same there's land there," he retorted, positively, his thin lips pressed together. "I've seen it; two islands, an' that's where the Sea Queen pokes her nose."

"The Hell You Say."

I could merely sit back, staring at the fellow, who remained leaning both hands on the table, his glinting eyes on my face.

"It's a rum yarn, Mr. Stephens, I'll admit," he said, slowly, his nasal tone much in evidence, "but it's all true, sir, so help me, God! Here's the straight of it, an' you listen quiet till I get done. Then I'll answer your questions as long as you've got any to ask."

CHAPTER X.

In Which I Hear the Tale of the First Officer.

Tuttle required a while getting started, pulling aside his dangling coat-tails to sit down facing me, and then twiddling his long fingers with his gaze bent on the deck. I take it that his intellectual operations were naturally slow, although he was swift enough in all matters appertaining to seamanship. Anyhow, he sat there for so long, his whole appearance so sleek and oily, that I lost all patience, shuffling my feet on the deck. The noise served to arouse him.

"It commenced somethin' like over two years ago sir," he began, mouthing each word with care, "a little earlier in the season than this is now. I was master of the whalin' bark Betsy, sailin' from Province town, an' we were homeward bound after about 18 months' cruisin' in the South Pacific, carryin' a fair cargo of oil an' whale trimmings. We were roundin' the Horn, being about 70 degrees west and 56 degrees south when the real trouble began. I know that was rather a low latitude, but we had been buckin' against head winds an' a high sea for more'n a week, an' besides were short-handed, five of the crew havin' skipped out at Somers island, where we put in after fresh water. Anyway, it was about there that a storm hit us from out the nor'east. I guess it must have been one end of a hurricane. I never see nothin' fiercer, even in those seas. There was nothin' to do but turn tail an' scud, the ropes and canvas being so stiff with ice. Well, we battened down, an' took chances, but for a while I thought every wave was goin' to do for the ol' hooker an' send us all to Davy Jones'. I couldn't see five feet from the rail, an' I had to keep diggin' ice out o' my eyes to see at all. The wind had the feel of a solid wall, sir."

Tuttle was leaning forward now, his elbows on the table. His lean, solemn countenance had lost its listlessness, and I also noticed the eager interest imprinted on the faces of his two comrades.

"We was jest roundin' the point," he went on as soon as he took a long breath, "the Betsy keelin' over so's her deck was half awash, an' with no more than maybe 100 yards o' clear water to the good. Back o' an ugly lookin' headland the coast seemed to fall away sudden into a sort o' cove, which was piled high with great ice hummocks, behind which the ice wall rose up sheer almost to the top o' the rocks. There was a sorter shelf along the edge of it, an' a-settin' up there in full view was the damndest lookin' vessel ever I saw in 50 years o' seafarin'. So help me God, sir, I saw it with my own eyes, as plain as I'm lookin' at you! It was h'isted up all o' 20 feet above the lower ice-field, an' sort o' careened over where it was froze fast so as to show the decks amidships clear to the inner rail. You remember them ships what Columbus sailed in? Well, this hooker was that kind, only a blame' sight bigger. I guessed her at 850 or 900 ton, but she had the same sort o' build—a big high stern, with an after-cabin clear acrost it, the waist sunk down in a curve, an' the fo'castle raised up like a house, with blunt bows, an' a monster bowsprit forkin' straight up into the air. The whole outfit was so cased with ice an' glittered so in the sun that it seemed like a part o' the ice cliff, which had took that queer shape from thawin' an' freezin'. Damme if I didn't think it was somethin' like that for a minute—a blame' freak o' nature—but when I grabbed the glasses, an' got a good look through them, it was a ship all right, the kind you read about in the books what navigated these waters a hundred or more years ago. I was still a-starin' at it with all my eyes when we raised the stern, which stood h'isted up a bit higher than the bow, an' where the steady dash of the waves didn't break clean over it, an' the sun fell just right so I read the hooker's name. By God, I did, sir! It was there plain as day: Donna Isabel, Cadiz."

The change in the man speaking held me breathless; his cant, his usually oily method of utterance had merged into an earnestness full of fascination.

"Well, that was about all, sir," his voice sinking back into commonplace. "In two hours we were out o' sight, an' feelin' our way through a blindin' snow squall. But it was such a rum thing, discoverin' them islands out there all uncharted, with that queer ghost ship perchin' on 'em, that I wrote down the latitude an' longitude an' the hooker's name in my log-book. We was about three weeks makin' the West Falklands, where I shipped a few more hands, an' then bore away north for home."

He drew a plug of tobacco from out his coat-tail pocket, cut off what he needed, and stowed it away in his cheek. He ran his fingers through his thin hair, and resumed:

'About 18 months later I was back with the ol' Betsy in the South Pacific. One night, with the moon shinin', hardly a ripple anywhere, my mate run her nose onto a rock, a couple o' hundred miles south o' Easter island, an' in less than 20 minutes the bark had gone down like a stone. We made Easter island in the boats without much trouble, but it wa'n't so easy to get away. I had six weeks of it before I got a chance, an' then I shipped afore the mast on a sandalwood trader. De Nova here was mate, an' finally, huntin' goods to peddle among the islanders, we sailed into Valparaiso, an' the most of us shipped out. Well, by that time I wasn't thinkin' very often about that ice-ship down in the Antar'tic; I was hustlin' for some sort o' berth to take me back to the States. But one night, down in Rodrigues' back room, where I hung out, I got to talkin' with a gambler named Francisco—the same smooth duck who introduced himself as De Castillo to you, sir. He was an educated man, an' seemed to like to hear me talk, an' among other sea yarns I happened to tell him this one. He seemed mighty interested, although he wasn't never given to seafarin', an' asked me a whole pile o' fool questions. Finally he wanted to meet me again alone the next day.

"Well, having' nothin' better to do, I was there when he came, an' he showed up with a queer-lookin', big, ol' book, the cover half ripped off, under his arm. Then he made me tell him that yarn over again, and describe the ship jest exactly as I remembered it. Then, when I'd got through, an' told him everything I could dig out o' my memory, he opened up that book o' his on the table, an' damme, sir, if he didn't show me a picture of that same ol' hooker, plain as life, only everything was trim an' shipshape on board, with the masts up an' the sails drawin'. The name was printed underneath, too—Donna Isabel, Cadiz.

"That book he showed me was printed in Spanish—not just like what you see to-day, sir, but the letterin' all rough, as though it had been cut out o' wood, but the fellow showed me the date when it was printed, an' it read 'Seville, 1779,' plain enough. Francisco wrote out in English what he said was printed there about this Donna Isabel; an' there it is, sir, in his own handwritin'."

He took the paper out of his inner coat pocket and spread it open on the table before us. De Nova and Anderson leaned forward eagerly to look at it, but Tuttle shoved it along toward me.

"Read it out loud, sir," he said, his voice trembling. The writing was not clear, and I held it up to the light.

"Galleon Donna Isabel, ship-rigged, 950 tons, Amador, Master, built 1730, home port Cadiz. Sailed Guayaquil for Valencia, June 11, 1753; crew numbered 32, passengers 17, including five women; carried treasure, in gold ingots and pieces of eight, valued at 3,000,000 pesos, consigned by Candamo, presidente, to department of the west, receipted for by Salvatore, government agent. Spoken by ship Conquistador, Sanchez, master, July 16, 1753, 80 degrees 20 minutes west and 47 degrees 15 minutes south; all well. Lost at sea; no report."

I put down the paper, and looked across at Tuttle; he sat motionless, his head in his hands. I confess the tale had affected me strangely, and I could not doubt that the man honestly believed every word he had uttered. Yet it was far too marvelous ever to be true; too impossible; too wildly romantic. It must have been a hallucination, an optical illusion born from a mirage of fog and sun in those frozen seas. Over 3,000,000 pesos, locked within the eternal ice for 126 years! Over 3,000,000 pesos, guarded by the dead for a century amid that grim desolation of crested sea! God! it was simply unthinkable, and I even ventured to smile at the credulity of the men about me; yet I did it with set jaws and lips parched and dry. What if it was all true? I felt the blood boiling up through my veins, every extremity tingling with the fever of it. Over 3,000,000 pesos! Merciful mother! it was the ransom of a king; it was the temptation of hell! I know not how I controlled my voice so as to question calmly, for, even as I first spoke, I noticed how my hands trembled where they rested on the outspread map.

"Is that all?"

Tuttle nodded his head, uplifting his eyes questioningly to mine.

"That's the whole of it, sir. What do you think?"

"That's more than I know, Mr. Tuttle. Perhaps you dreamed, perhaps Francisco lied. I should have liked to see that book."

I bent lower over the chart, staring at the red cross.

"What was it you men wanted me for?"

"To operate the steamer, sir; the rest of us aboard only understand sailin' vessels."

"Yes, of course; but why did you happen to choose a steamer for the job? There were plenty of sailing craft lying in the harbor easier to steal than this yacht."

"Very true, but it happened to be steam power we wanted. Here is about how we figured it, sir. First place, we had to get away quickly out of those portions of the sea where they'd be most likely to hunt for us. We're outlaws, an' every ship sailin' under a flag is an enemy. Well, sir, what chance would a sailin' vessel have in such a chase? We needed somethin' that would show 'em a clean pair o' heels—somethin' that would give 'em a run for their money. That's what this yacht can do; she's pokin' it now at sixteen."

"Yes; you've got the advantage," I confessed, "so long as your coal lasts. But you can't put in anywhere for a new supply—what then?"

He turned partially about, and winked at De Nova; the fellow grinned back at him, but burst in eagerly:

"Oh, we're not quite so green as all zat, Mons. Stephens, an' I t'ink we got zis t'ing plan' out jus' 'bout right. We steam so till we get maybe far 'nough south we're zey quit look for us. How it be 130 degrees west an' 40 degrees south? Nobody t'ink we go zere—non, non. We got coal plenty for zat, an' zen have bunch left. I know; I try it. No more need push her eizer after we leave ze Ferdandez—we be well ahead zen. Zen we rig up ze schooner sails, an' make ze next t'ousan' mile wizout burn' a poun'. You see how it do? Ze danjaire was not, for in zat ocean we meet nossing but maybe ze whale ship."

"You understand what he means, sir?" went on Tuttle, as the creole paused for breath. "Once well ahead we can fall back on canvas, and save the coal. But we'll need the steam power down there to hold her off an' on by the island while we do the job. it's a mighty nasty bit o' water, an' a sailin' vessel is apt to get pinched in the ice. But with a steamer we can hold her to it, however the wind blows."

I looked at the fellow with greater respect. Evidently he had considered every angle of the desperate game he was playing.

"Your scheme certainly sounds reasonable enough," I admitted, almost reluctantly. "And the chances are you will get there all right. But suppose you do; suppose you discover this mysterious island; suppose you find there the galleon as you say; suppose you even succeed in getting aboard, and into possession of the treasure—what then? Don't you know you're bound to be caught the minute you come out of the Antarctic into any ocean patrolled by the fleets of the world? You have committed piracy—a crime against the nations—and the civilized world will unite to hunt you down."

"That's another reason why we had to have a steamer," he explained, calmly. "You just remarked that they'd be lookin' for the Sea Queen to come back. Well, let 'em look; they won't never see her, sir. Once we get that gold under hatches, an' back as far as that rock they call Dougherty island—an' that's only a run o' maybe 500 miles—I'll engage to make over this here Sea Queen so that her own captain wouldn't know her 50 feet away. How? I'd strip the engines out o' her, h'ist the stack overboard, tear down the bridge an' wheelhouse, rig her as a barkentine, change every line o' paint fore an' aft, an' then wreck her somewhere along the east Patagonian coast, or maybe the Falklands. It would be nothin' but a bloomin' whaler gone ashore, an' afore anybody finds out different, we'll be scattered to hell an' back."

I was obliged to acknowledge to myself that it was not an impossible plan. Eliminating the chance of accident or some unusually bad luck, success appeared not only possible, but probable.

"Did you think all that out yourself, Mr. Tuttle?"

"Well, Francisco suggested considerable, but we did it together."

"Where is he? on board?"

The mate laughed, his eyes expressive of contempt.

"Not much, he hadn't the nerve. He's a schemer all right, but a blame' coward."

"But suppose he gets to talking back there in Valparaiso?"

It was big Bill Anderson who answered me, disgusted with our long controversy.

"Oh, to hell wid Francisco!" he broke in, gruffly. "It's w'at you're goin' to do we want to know. Francisco'll hold his gaff well enough. He expects a bit of the swag, an', besides, I let him know what was comin' to him if he let his tongue wag. I had him right, let me tell ye. An', damme, Mr. Stephens," the bully in him breaking all bounds, "if it ain't comin' the same way to any other duffer who goes back on us this trip. That's what talks!" He jerked his sheath-knife from his belt, and, with one fierce lunge, drove it half to the hilt into the table, his brute eyes scowling threateningly into mine.

Economic and Political Liberty For Women as Well as Men.

By BRAND WHITLOCK, Author, Mayor of Toledo, O.

I BELIEVE in democracy, in brotherhood, in humanity. I believe that the voice of the people comes as near being the VOICE OF GOD as any voice that speaks in these days.

DEMOCRACY MEANS THAT EVERY PERSON IN THE LAND SHOULD HAVE HIS VOTE. WE IN AMERICA HAVE NOT DEMOCRACY. WE HAVE, AFTER CENTURIES OF STRIVING, ACHIEVED POLITICAL LIBERTY FOR MEN. I HOPE TO SEE THE DAY WHEN WE WILL HAVE POLITICAL LIBERTY FOR WOMEN. MORE THAN THAT, I HOPE TO SEE THE TIME WHEN THERE SHALL BE ECONOMIC LIBERTY FOR BOTH MEN AND WOMEN.

There are certain rights which are elemental. The right to vote is one of these. Men vote because they are men. Women should vote because THEY ARE WOMEN. Not wealth nor education nor birth nor sex should interfere with the exercise of this right.

I am not unaware of the opposition of many women to the extension of the ballot to their sisters. These are the women who do not know the world, who do not come in contact, as most women do, with the hard realities of the economic world and the struggle for existence. These are the WOMEN WHO LIVE OUT OF CHECK BOOKS, who oppose progress.

Then, too, there is another class of women not taking their part in the fight, a class which perhaps exists because of the life these other women live, a class so ground down under the wheel of daily economic strife that it has NO TIME NOR ENERGY LEFT to devote to the fight for its rights.

Complaint is made that women would VOTE AS THEIR HUSBANDS OR BROTHERS VOTED without thinking for themselves. The men who tell us this are usually the kind who don't know what their political principles are until the committee on resolutions has reported.

WE ARE TOLD THAT WOMEN INFLUENCE THE VOTES OF MEN. NO ONE IS EVER INFLUENCED BY THE VOTE OF A PERSON ECONOMICALLY DEPENDENT ON HIM. THAT IS WHY IT IS SO NECESSARY THAT TO HAVE TRUE DEMOCRACY WOMEN MUST BE ECONOMICALLY AS WELL AS POLITICALLY FREE.

Women Not Fitted For Great Affairs.

By ALFRED AUSTIN, Poet Laureate of England.

OF all national and imperial issues that can arise that of peace or war is the most important, and the preservation of peace, the most precious of all things, consistently with honor and self protection, is much more likely to be imperiled by INDULGENCE IN SENTIMENT than by any other cause.

Calm, deliberate judgment, free from all untimely or TOO GENEROUS EMOTION, is its best protection. Will any one deny that in great emergencies men are, as a rule and collectively, calmer and more submissive to sound judgment than women, whose virtues reside rather in another direction?

GIVE EMOTIONALLY COMBATIVE WOMEN THE FRANCHISE AND IT IS CONCEIVABLE THAT WAR MIGHT BE BROUGHT ABOUT BY WOMEN, AGAINST THE EFFORT OF MEN TO AVERT IT, AND IN THAT EVENT IT WOULD BE MEN, AND MEN ALONE, WHO WOULD HAVE TO FIGHT AND, IF NEED WERE, TO DIE, WHILE THE VERY UTMOST WOMEN COULD DO WOULD BE TO ACT, AS ONE IS PLEASED TO REMEMBER A POET HAS CALLED THEM, AS MINISTERING ANGELS.

I own I share the terse conclusion of a French wit: "ONE POLITICIAN THE MORE, ONE MOTHER THE LESS—behold the practical outcome of female franchise!"

Women Should Discard Claim to Chivalry.

By Mrs. HARRIET STANTON BLATCH, Woman Suffragist.

WOMEN should give up chivalry and all such nonsense. Whoever heard of man's chivalry toward a workingwoman or a woman that had to scrub?

CHIVALRY IS A THEORY ANYWAY, A DISCREDITED THEORY, AND THE SOONER WOMEN DROP ALL CLAIMS TO IT AND DEMAND THEIR BALLOT BOX RIGHTS THE BETTER IT WILL BE FOR AMERICAN WOMANHOOD.

Evils of District and Ward Representation In Our Government.

By Professor ANDREW S. WADE of the University of Kansas.

THE ward and district system of representation in our assemblies and congress is the ROOT OF MOST OF THE EVILS which are complained of today in connection with municipal, county and state corruption.

Our best expression in government is thus found in our national system. Next comes the state system, and worst is that of our municipalities. Yet in all of these the most discouraging problems, the greatest menace, the most prolific source of evil, rest in REPRESENTATION BY FIXED DIVISIONS.

CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT REPRESENTATION MAKES LOCAL ISSUES OF NATIONAL QUESTIONS, SUCH AS THE TARIFF. IT ENABLES SPECIAL INTERESTS AND SPECIAL PRIVILEGE TO KEEP THEIR AGENTS ON THE FLOOR OF CONGRESS. IT ENABLES CERTAIN MEN TO SELL THEMSELVES, AND SO THEIR CONSTITUENCIES, TO BAD INFLUENCES IN ORDER TO SECURE PREFERENCE FOR THEIR DISTRICTS.

In congress this is the result of a growth away from the constitutional provision as to state representation. It is one of the several ways in which custom has nullified the constitution, and it would be vastly better if the states returned to that REPRESENTATION AT LARGE for which alone the constitution provides.

HELPFUL JOHNNY.

He Thought He Was Doing a Great Thing In Cutting Out the Appendix.

JOHNNY loved his papa, there was no doubt about that, and one morning after he had listened to a long disquisition from the author of his being addressed to his elders on the general uselessness of the vermiform appendix, ending up with the broad statement that he hoped he'd see the day when every appendix in creation was cut out, the little boy resolved upon an agreeable surprise for his daddy. He worked in secret for several days and then sprang it.

"See what I have done for you, daddy," he said, leading the wondering father into the library and showing him a neat pile of many pages which he had accumulated. "I've cut the appendix out of every book in this library."

It was then that words failed, and Johnny's father's vocabulary made a general assignment for the benefit of its creditors.—John Kendrick Bangs in Judge.

The Ruling Passion.

His clothes said he was a tramp, but his brow was high and his manner grand. "Madam, may I request the favor of a pair of your husband's cast-off trousers? These are somewhat passee." This, with a sweep of a tattered hat, brought results in the shape of a pair of hubby's oldest, which were just about two degrees better than those the tramp was wearing. After a critical survey of his acquisition, instead of the polite words of thanks the good woman was waiting for, the tramp volunteered, with a deep, long drawn sigh of regret, "Madam, I see your husband discards from weakness."—Puck.

Trading Wisdom For Coin.

"When I started in business I was compelled to borrow $200," said the magnate.

"Without security?"

"Absolutely without security. But I gave the man advice that was worth many times the sum."

"What was it?"

"Never to take another chance like that with me or anybody else."—Washington Star.

In Hard Luck.

Willie Walker (gazing at one of the secret marks of his order)—Here's a go! I've lost me code book and can't remember whether this means "bulldog" or "a free meal."

Which Tooth Causes This?

"I am greatly interested," says the man with the irregular bald spot and the visible collar button, "in this new theory that the condition of the teeth has an influence upon the moral character of the person possessing them."

"Yes?" responds the man with the excited necktie. "I suppose half the profanity in the world is occasioned by the cuspids."—Chicago Post.

Indolent Ezekiel.

"What's that you call the hired man—Airy? But his name is Ezekiel," we remonstrated.

"Airy for short," returned the farmer.

"Short for Ezekiel?"

"No; for aeroplane. You see, Zeke's like an aeroplane because he won't work more'n ten or fifteen minutes at a stretch."—New York Press.

Forbidden Fruit.

"Your luncheons are always so successful, Mrs. Penrhyn-Paget! Do tell me how you select your menus?"

"Oh, you see, the doctor has given me a printed list of things I mustn't eat, and I choose the dishes from that."—Woman's Home Companion.

Her Query.

"Where is my husband's valet?" asked Mrs. Sorer.

"He is fitting on Mr. Sorer's new boots, ma'am," the butler answered.

"And is my husband with him?" she inquired.—Minneapolis Journal.

"We Regret the Inclosed"—

"Regret seems to be a favorite note with poets."

"Naturally. Most poets are well acquainted with regrets."—Kansas City Times.

Mr. Russell Pattison, well known throughout the George's Creek region and Cumberland, as one of the strong members of the Piedmont baseball team in its balmy days when Piedmont had the grit and the dough to maintain a nine, left on train No. 5 over the B. & O. for Grafton on Tueaday. It is understood he will be given a trial by the Grafton management and if he makes good he will be signed as a regular member of its pitching staff.

The Peewee mine, near Blaine, owned by the Potomac Valley Coal Co., which had to suspend operations a few weeks ago, on account of its miners refusing to accept a reduction of wages to 45 cents a ton, resumed work under the company's terms with a full complement of men on Monday morning. It is said that abont 20 of the old men were discharged. The Three Forks Coal Co., operating the Chaffee mine, at Chaffee, notified their miners that the 45 cent rate would go into effect on last Monday morning. The miners at first refused to work, but later on accepted the terms of the company and went to work Thursday morning. Three mines in the Upper Potomac region are now digging coal for 45 cents—the North American, Peewee and Chaffee—and it is the general opinion now that in a short time this will be the established rate throughout the entire region.

The Home Merchant.

In an editorial on "Why it Pays to Buy Goods at Home" the Liberal (Kan.) Independent has this deserved appreciation of the home merchant:

Without any thought of sentiment or suggestion that we owe allegiance to any one, the cold, hard truth is that the retail merchants of our home town are the best friends we have.

The retail merchant conducts a school of commerce for our education—and the tuition is free. Every man, woman and child gets the benefit of seeing in the home town about anything that is of real importance. He protects us against fraud and deceit. He stands for the square deal.

You never ordered a $10 lightning rod of your home merchant and then found your note for a thousand dollars in the bank next day as a result. You never paid him $60 for a range that warped out of shape in six months—without your wife getting the money back. He never charged you $75 for a "trailer" buggy that you found out afterwards could be bought anywhere for $60.

No, the home merchant is jnst like you. He lives where he does business and his success depends on making a friend of you and your neighbor. Like you, he has to make good.

The retail merchant is now the one great factor in our commercial system and this is true solely because he renders us better service than we can get elsewhere. Take him away and our home town is gone; take our home town away and we deprive our children of the retail store, which is the greatest single educational factor in modern life. No, it cannot be. The retail merchant will continue to abide in our affections long as we value our homes, because the average citizen is proud of his town and he secretly despises the method of peddlers—and the peddler system is now known to be the legitimate father of the whole catalogue house business.

In making this report the Commission has thought well to make the following explanation: Under Chapter 788 of the Acts of 1906, and Chapter 370 of the Acts of 1908, the Court House Commission has received from the Board of County Commissioners the sum of $78,000.00 and also an additional sum of $40.00 from A. D. Naylor & Company, in all $78,040.00.

This amount would have fully covered the original contracts and cost of work and materials which were $75,479.31. But as the work progressed and the building developed there were certain changes and additions, which in the opinion of the entire Commission it was eminently proper, wise and ultimately economical to make, these additions were therefore ordered, their aggregate being $4,470.00. They included stone columns in the porticos, marble floor and copper roof, all of which added materially to the character and durability of the building.

On account of the above mentioned changes, there was a deficit of $1,909.31. This amount has been met by the Board of County Commissioners and paid to the Court House Commission, and makes the total cost of the New Court House to Garrett County $79,949.31.

We feel this moderate for such a substantial and handsome structnre.

SHERIFF'S SALE

OF

Farming Land

Under and by virtue of a writ of fieri facias issued out of the Circuit Court for Garrett County at the suit of Phillip F. Smith vs. John W. Carroll et ux, to me directed and delivered and duly levied on the hereinafter described land, the undersigned Sheriff of Garrett County, have seized and taken in execution, and in front of the Post Office at Oakland, Garrett county in Maryland, at the hour of 4 o'clock P. M. on Saturday, the 29th Day of May,

1909, will offer at public sale to the highest bidder all the right and title and interest of the said John W. Carroll and wife in and to that tract of land in Garrett County, lying about one half mile west of Frankville, and embracing about twenty four acres and thirty perches, improved with some cherry, plum and apple trees:

NOTICE TO TAXPAYERS!

This is to notify the tax payers of Garrett county that the Annual Levy for 1909 has been made and published, and to call their attention to the following abstract Section 45, Chapter 586, Acts of 1890, relating to the discount to be allowed and the interest to be charged on all tax bills.

"All county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of the levy thereof, and on all county taxes paid on or before the 1st day of September a discount of 3 per cent. will be allowed, and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. The Treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the tax bills for county purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt given for taxes so paid. But the discount shall not be allowed unless the whole amount of state and county are paid when same is made.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JUNE 3, 1909. NUMBER 14

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. SARAH JANE SCOTT.

Sarah Jane Scott, daughter of the late Joseph B. and Sarah Davis, was born in Somerset county, Pennsylvania, August 5, 1842, and died at her home in Oakland June 1, 1909. Mrs. Scott came with her parents to the Promised Land farm in the vicinity of Oakland in 1861. In 1863 she taught school at the Snyder school house in the bounds of the Kingwood circuit where her brother Wesley was assistant pastor. March 28, 1867, Miss Davis was married to Michael L. Scott, of Preston county, West Virginia, by Rev. R. W. Wallace. After serving for a time in Mr. Horner's store in Baltimare, Mr. Scott located in Oakland and opened the Baltimore Store. Mr. Scott died June 24, 1897. Mrs. Scott was converted by Rev. (now Bishop) C. W. Smith in Bethel M. E. church, near her early home, in 1859, and from the date of her arrival here has been a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal church in Oakland. Mrs. Scott was taken ill a little over a week ago and although she received skillful treatment and had the services of a competent corps of trained nurses, her condition was such that the disease would not yield to treatment, and her death resulted. Her funeral will occur from the M. E. church in Oakland this afternoon at 2.30 o'clock, Rev. J. B. Workman, pastor, officiating.

JEROME GRIFFIN.

Jerome Griffin, a native of Ireland, died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Charles Welling, in Oakland, on May 29th, after a week's illness resulting from a stroke of paralysis. Mr. Griffin was by profession a civil engineer and was a graduate of Dublin University. He was a member of the Catholic church and was buried from that edifice on Monday morning after a mass said by the pastor, Rev. James E. Connell. The interment was made in the cemetery here.

GORTNER.

Mr. Daniel Dodge arrived here on Saturday from Western Iowa, I will spend a few weeks with his nephew, D. W. Dodge.

Mr. and Mrs. L. H. Killius, of Oakland, spent Sunday with relatives at this place.

Rev. Harry Gilnett, of Boynton, Pa., was the guest of P. P. Gortner Sunday.

Chas. Sander spent Sundav last with Grover Gortner near Loch Lynn.

Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Slabach, of Piedmont, W. Va., were pleasant callers at the home of D. J. Slabach Sunday.

Sabbath school next Sunday at 10 a. m. WILLIE.

MEMORIAL DAY WAS OBSERVED IN OAKLAND

Old Soldiers and Others Participated In the Exercises of the Occasion.

Memorial Day was observed as usual on Monday lsst, when the old soldiers, under the command of Captain J. M. Jarboe, members of the Oakland Normal School, led by Prof. U. G. Palmer and school children in charge of Dr. Button and citizens generally, led by the Mountain City Band of Oakland, repaired to the cemeteries and strewed flowers upon the graves of their departed comrades, both Blue and Grey, friends and relatives.

Crook Post, Grand Army of the Republic, under whose direction the occasion was observed, assembled at Post Headquarters, and at 10.30 took up the line of march for the cemeteries.

On arriving at the cemeteries details of old soldiers strewed flowers on the graves of their sleeping comrades, after which the ritual service was used, followed by a most able and patriotic address by Rev. J. B. Workman and a few pertinent remarks by Rev. E. Manges.

On assembling it was announced that Commander Sturgiss was not able to occupy the post filled with such honor since the first organization of the Post. It was unanimously determined to pay him the honor richly due him by forming in front of his residence and giving him the G. A. R. salute. Col. Sturgiss returned the salute with deep feeling.

Sixteen of the old "boys" were in the ranks, probably a larger number than will ever be present on a like occasion in the future.

Rev. E. Manges acted as chaplain and John O. Michael as officer of the day.

MORE CONCERNING THE ARREST OF ELOPERS.

Grafton Paper Gives Additional Information About Parties Arrested Here.

From the Grafton Republican of last Thursday evening the following account is taken concerning Helen Zaruba, of Clarksburg, who was married here last Wednesday morning to Julius Pletenik, the arrest of both parties occurring soon afterward. Thursday morning the mother of the bride came to Oakland and had her daughter released, accompanying her home the same morning as stated in this paper of that day:

Chief of Police Clarence Brooks, of Clarksburg, arrived in the city on train No. 3 this morning, accompanied by Mrs. Chas. Zaruba and her daughter, Helen, aged about sixteen years, who figured in one of the most sensational elopements that our sister city has known in a decade. Indeed, the fact now becomes apparent that the case may contain far graver details than those of a mere sensational elopement, and that the unfortunate young girl was coerced into a marriage at once distasteful and against her better judgment may be plainly seen.

Chief Brooks, in conversation with a Daily Republican reporter at the noon hour today, stated that the young girl, Helen Zaruba, daughter of Banker and Merchant Zaruba, of Clarksburg, had eloped with Julius Pletenik, formerly employed by Zaruba. She had left her home in the middle of the night, by means of a ladder, joining Pletenik, and the two had gone to Oakland, Md. Considerable time had elapsed following the elopement and the discovery of the same, but as soon as the parents found out what had occurred they wired the police of a number of cities, to apprehend the elopers and hold them for instructions.

It appears, however, that the girl and Pletenik had reached Oakland, obtained a license and were married before orders for their arrest were received. Following their arrest at Oakland they were held until Chief of Police Brooks and Mrs. Zaruba could arrive there on No. 12 last evening. Helen, the bride, seemed greatly relieved when her mother and police arrived and took her in custody, and she gladly accompanied her mother back home, and shortly after the arrival of the mother and policeman the young girl unfolded a tale which, if true, will cause still greater sensations and that ought to put the groom in the penitentiary for the rest of his natural life, and some others with him.

It seems that Pletenik, the man Helen married, together with Albert Kloske, were formerly employed by Mr. Zaruba in a store. The two are charged with having confiscated much of the merchant's property, and some time ago were arrested in Pennsylvania and brought back to Clarksburg and were in jail awaiting trial, when Pletenik was released on bond. Helen now claims that she was told, and led to believe, that unless she married Pletenik both her father and her mother would be killed and their property burned, and that worked on her mind to such an extent that she finally agreed to marry Pletenik. She now says that she "never wants to look upon his face again."

Helen also makes some serious charges against a woman residing in Clarksburg with whom she was on friendly terms, stating among other things that the woman had taken from her a large amount of personal property. The list of property given Chief Brooks included the following: Two diamond rings, one solitaire ring, one signet ring, one gold watch with diamond setting, two pair earrings, one ruby ring with diamond cluster, and $25 dollars in gold. Chief of Police Brooks is of the opinion that the threats of marriage were made in hope that the same would really be brought about and that such an alliance would have the effect of stopping the proceedings against Pletenik by Mr. Zaruba on the robbery charge. Chief Brooks (who by the way is an old Grafton boy and one of the finest looking that ever went from this town to another), expects some very sensational development in this case at an early date.

The following telegram from Clarksburg, the home of the Zarubas, under date of June 1, adds to the story:

"Julius Pletenik added another chapter to his rapidly growing history today when he went before Justice of the Peace P. M. Long and had warrants issued for the arrest of Chief of Police Harry Brooks and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Zaruba, parents of his wife, charging them together and separately with alienating the affections of the wife of his bosom, Mrs. Helen Zaruba Pletenik. It will be remembered that some time since when the story opened young Julius looked out of the barred windows of the Clarksburg jail on a sad world for was not he imprisoned there charged with filching sums of money from the strong box of old man Zaruba from his bank where Julius was once a trusted clerk. Then Helen appeared, then a coy and trembling maid, and secured the release of said trusted Julius. Away went the pair to Oakland and in this quiet retreat were the words pronounced and Helen and Julius were one.

"Thus ended the first part of the stirring romance of the Modern Croesus and the Poor Young Clerk. Next the Zaruba family took the center of the stage. A family council was held and plans were laid. Helen was brought back from the sylvan retreat of fair Maryland by chief Brooks and the mother. Julius took this as the first step of the forgiveness and the reassembling of the family. But the plans were otherwise. Saturday night Helen was hastily and mysteriously taken to the train and sent to the tribes of Zaruba in the metropolis of New York, that she might forget and be comforted. For even as fair Helen of old caused war and the fall Troy so fair Helen of modern time caused war and the fall of—— who knows whom.

"Julius got busy again. This time he had the warrants issued. As yet they have not been served. When approached on the subject Chief Brooks expressed surprise. He denied having ever a collusion with the family Zaruba or alone having tried to steal away the affects of Helen. The family did not talk about the new phase of the subject. The more people wait the result with much interest."

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. Thomas Swann, aged 73 years, died suddenly at his home in this place on Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock. A short time before he was stricken he had been working in his garden, but not feeling well, went to the house, sat on a chair in the kitchen and complained to his wife of a constriction about his chest. In a few minutes he became unconscious and died suddenly. Mr. Swann came to Garrett county from Prince George county in 1872, and had lived in Bloomington continuously up to the time of his death. He leaves a wife and four children, all grown, two sons, Messrs. Thomas and Arthur Swann, and two daughters, Mrs. Helen Stevens, of Keyser, and Miss Edna, at home. His funeral occurred on Thursday afternoon, with interment in the Bloomington graveyard.

Mr. Carroll Pattison is visiting Mr. L. B. Bryden, of Gratton.

Mr. Warren D. Howard, of Luke, and Miss Pearl V. Thomas, of near Beryl, W. Va., were married at the home of the bride on Tuesday morning at ten o'clock by Rev. John T. Creek, pastor of the M. E church, at Bloomington.

Mr. William Moody, a well known business man and merchant, of this place, is confined to his room, nursing a severe attack of rheumatism.

PRISONERS WILL BE BROUGHT TO OAKLAND.

Pending Improvements to the Allegany County Jail.

The work of making improvements to the jail, the contract for which was let out yesterday, will commence just as soon as the material arrives, and will be mostly done by local people.

MacFarlane & Shaffer have the contract for placing and plumbing the electric lights and heating, and Sells Brothers for the masonry and concrete work.

The prisoners will be taken to the jail at Oakland, just as soon as the workmen commence to tear out the interior of the jail here.

Some of the prisoners who are serving short jail sentences will not be taken to Oakland, but will be confined in the city lockup. The work on the jail will be completed by the first of October.—Cumberland Times.

Anderson Out With Charges.

In red-hot signed statement issued Tuesday, Superintendent William H. Anderson of the Maryland Anti-Sloon League charges that "the State of Maryland and the city of Baltimore are being defrauded of vast sums of liquor-license money amounting to over a quarter of a million dollars in the last year."

Mr. Anderson declares that more than 500 places in Baltimore have been selling liquor without a license and characterizes this state of affairs as a "gigantic fraud" upon the public, and he maintains that "somebody protects" these places either gratuitously or for a consideration.

Mr. L. W. Clark, who recently sold his farm south of Oakland and moved to town, bought the home place of the late William Groves, and will occupy it in a short time.

OAKLAND WILL CELEBRATE THE NATION'S BIRTHDAY

The Aninversary Falling On Sunday, Monday Will be Observed.

Oakland is making extensive preparations to properly celebrate the Glorious Fourth, but as that day falls on Sunday this year the festivities will occur on the day following.

At a meeting held last Thursday night the preliminaries such as appointing soliciting and other committees, were arranged and last night additional committees, including a publicity committee was chosen. Handsome advertising matter will be gotten out as soon as possible and the event will be heralded throughout this and other counties which will insure a great crowd in Oakland that day.

Funeral of Rowland Whitwam.

Funeral services over the remains of the late Rowland Whitwam, whose death on Monday last was mentioned in THE REPUBLICAN last week, together with a short sketch of his career, took place from his late home on Piedmont street, Keyser, Wednesday evening, conducted by Rev. J. C. Hawk, of the M. E. Church South, of which the deceased was a member.

On Thursday morning the body was brought to Oakland, where at 11 o'clock funeral services were held at the home of Mrs. Lawton, after which the body was laid to rest in the I. O. O. F. cemetery, at this place.

At the home services in Keyser quite a number of relatives and friends were present. Several members of the choir from the M. E. Church South sang "Lead Kindly Light," "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," and "Life's Railway to Heaven."

Those who accompanied the body to Oakland were: Mrs. Alice Whitwam and three children, his mother, Mrs. Helen Whitwam, two sisters, Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Morris, and two brother, Messrs. Charles and Wallace Whitwam, and also quite a number of his railroad friends. The pallbearers were: Messrs. William McFarlane, Charley Blackburn, J. H. Main, Ed. Gilbaugh, W. Shaffer and J. Snider. The floral offerings were many and beautiful. Flowers sent: From the W. C. T. U., a large bunch of white carnations; Pythian Sisters, bunch of flowers, and the ladies of the Grand Army of Clarksburg, a large bunch of calla lilies; brothers and sisters, a broken wheel, cousin, a large bunch of roses, besides numerous other bunches of flowers from sorrowing friends.

BITTINGER.

Memorial Day was a fittingly celebrated in this village last Saturday. The weather was ideal and many persons from nearby communities spent the day with us and a half a score of old soldiers met in the village cemetery and held fitting services over the graves of their departed comrades. The address of the day was delivered by Rev. J. B. Shoup.

Miss Minnie Hetrick, of Negro Mountain, was the guest of Jonas Bittinger and family last Saturday and Sunday.

Thomas Henry Bittinger, of Grantsville, spent last Sunday with relatives and friends here.

Misses Dorothy and Beatrice Heyward, of Bond, are pleasant visitors in this neighborhood at this writing.

James P. Wiley spent part of last week looking over the battle field at Gettysburg, Pa., and witnessed Memorial Day exercises at that place.

C. H. Jennings took advantage of the fine weather and good roads last week and was seen going about in his automobile.

Mrs. Sallie Ralston, of Keyser, W. Va., who spent the past two weeks with her daughter at this place, returned to Keyser early this week.

Rev. J. B. Shoup is spending this week among his old friends near New Germany.

Mahlon Brenneman, of McHenry, spent last Sunday in this neighborhood, visiting friends and relatives.

Attorneys Sincell, Thayer and Mitchell, of Oakland, passed through this village on Friday of last week.

Hurt in Runaway.

S. A. Nally, of Oakland, was thrown from his buggy at a point near Hutton Tuesday evening and painfully injured. The horse he was driving became frightened and ran away and it was not until the following day that it was found. Mr. Nally was brought to his home by Charles Pendergast, of Hutton, where he received surgical treatment by Dr. Henry W. McComas.

HIGH PRAISE FOR OAKLAND.

Mr. Howard V. Thomas, of Northern Natural Gas Co., Says Some Nice Things.

In an interview published in the Cumberland Times of last Thursday, with Mr. Howard V. Thomas, president of the Northern Natural Gas Company, the following is taken:

In an interview last evening with Mr. H. V. Thomas, vice-president of the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Co., regarding the particulars of the certificate of incorporation, recently granted by the Circuit Court for Allegany County to The Northern Natural Gas Co., a Times representative was told by Mr. Thomas that The Northern Natural Gas Co., is a subsidiary company of the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Co., and was formed for the purpose of introducing natural gas into Garrett county, Md., and Preston county, West Virginia. The towns to be supplied in the former are Oakland, Loch Lynn, Deer Park, and Hutton, and possibly the grounds of the Mt. Lake Park Community and in Preston county, W. Va., Corinth and Terra Alta, in which towns pipe lines for the distribution of gas are to be constructed.

The citizens of the above-named towns having realized the convenience and benefits of natural gas in Cumberland and adjoining towns, have urgently solicited the company for several months past to make this extension and have presented the company with contracts for about 600 consumers who have agreed to take gas and pipe their residences and business places within sixty days after the work is completed.

Mr. Thomas states that the rights of way have been secured and the pipe purchased, some of which has already arrived, and that his company will begin constructing the line immediately with the expectation of having it completed about August 1.

The connection with the main line of the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Co., will be made near Gormania, W. Va., and will be extended direct to Oakland. This line will be of six inch pipe and of sufficient capacity to supply not only domestic consumers, but commercial business as well. A line will be laid east from Oakland to Deer Park and west to Terra Alta, supplying the towns intervening.

"Mr. Thomas, since you have been here, have you visited this new territory you propose to supply with natural gas?" asked the reporter.

"Yes, I spent the last two days in those towns in company with Mr. Northrup, the superintendent of the West Virginia and Maryland Gas Co. Mr. J. B. Cheuvront, now in charge of the plant at Lonaconing, has been appointed local superintendent and will remove to Oakland and reside there. These gentlemen will have charge of the construction of the new lide.

"In addition it will require that two or three other men be tranrsferred to Oakland, who will be permanently located there to assist Mr. Cheuvront in operating the plant after it has been completed."

"What was the sentiment of the people in the towns you visited regarding natural gas, Mr. Thomas?"

"I found everybody not only enthusiastic, but delighted over the prospects of having natural gas introduced into their towns and highly gratified that their efforts in securing contracts was to accomplish the desired end."

"What is your opinion of these mountain towns?"

"I regard them very highly indeed. I have in mind no towns equal in size to Oakland and Terra Alta with as many handsome residences. All of which I think are above the average. The people appear wide awake and progressive, proud of their home towns and anxious for their growth and advancement. Both of these towns are arranging to put in up-to-date water systems at once, while Oakland, will in addition put in this year a sewerage system. Terra Alta is arranging to pave a portion of its main street. The climate of Terra Alta, Oakland, Deer Park and Loch Lynn is famous throughout the country, as is evidenced by the large number of summer hotels and boarding houses. Mountain Lake Park is a most attractive spot and within the 800 acres owned by the Community, there are over 200 summer homes in addition to several hotels. I believe that all of these people will appreciate the advent and advantages of natural gas."

Origin of Cards Is Unknown.

Historians agree that the best evidence as to the age of playing cards is negative. That is to say, if no mention of cards is found in places in which they naturally would be spoken of, it may safely be assumed that the writers did not know of them.

Modest Modern Man.

Whatever may be said of the modern man, he cannot be said to be lacking in modesty. While the ancients did their utmost to prove that they issued from the gods, we do our best to demonstrate that we have descended from monkeys.—Paris Journal.

BOY SPENDS COLD NIGHT IN A SHED

PUPIL IN A NEW YORK SCHOOL LOCKED UP BY MISTAKE IN OUTBUILDING.

IS SOUGHT LONG ERE FOUND

Hungry Rat Comes to Bite Him Under His Vest, and Cold Makes Him Keep Moving for Several Hours.

New York.—Albert L. Percival, Jr., who is only a very little boy, eight years old, spent all Friday night and part of Saturday recently locked up by mistake in a shed in the yard of a school in the Bronx, listening to the squeaking of rats and fighting the bitter cold the best such a little boy could know how.

The boy had heard the janitor's key turn in the lock just a minute after he had run in there to hide from his playmates when school had been dismissed for the day. Even as he began pounding on the door he could hear the janitor's footsteps passing through the yard and into the rear of the school building.

After he had called and called until his throat was sore he began to walk about the dark alleyway of the room.

It was supper time before long, and down under the fold of his sweater the little fellow felt the Hungry Rat moving around. He had often wondered just how badly this Hungry Rat could bite, especially on days when the range at home wouldn't work, and his mother had told him that he would have to wait for his supper. But this time the Hungry Rat did bite for sure—just chewed and nibbled and made a pain come right where the supper ought to have been.

Soon it was totally dark. As he walked up and down the little fellow would keep one hand on the walls to guide his steps. Albert had never been taught that all kinds of bogies and skippy men swarmed the night, but it is one thing to be sitting in the circle of the reading lamp and look outside to see how black it is and another to be outside with not a spear of light anywhere.

Out of the dark, strange shapes, which changed every time he winked his eyes, began to draw in closer and closer about the huddled little boy there on the cold cement floor. And what was a good deal worse, there were sharp squeaks sounding from over his head, out of black corners and cracks in the floor.

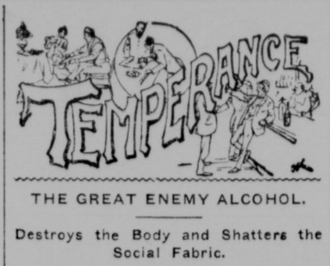
It was so cold. Under the door the wind blew in with quick gusts that carried snow crystals from the piles out in the yard. Albert pulled his stocking cap down over his face way to the neck and doubled his hands in under the roll of his sweater. First his feet burned, then they went to sleep, and when he walked it was like walking on somebody else's foot. Shivers ran up and down his back.

The youngster remembered a story, one he had read in the second reader about a man who had fallen asleep in the snow and who never woke up. He was bound that he would not fall asleep. So he took out his nickel watch that had been given him for Christmas and held it to his ear, first with one hand and then with the other, turn about, so that the fingers would not get too cold to hold the watch. The ticking kept him awake until morning came.

On Saturday the boy's father went to two camps of gypsies out on the edge of the Bronx, thinking that the boy might have been kidnaped. Then about ten o'clock he went to the school and asked the assistant janitor to make a search of the buildings, which resulted in finding the boy. It was some time before he could speak.

Boy Given in Horse Trade.

Tompkinsville, Ky.—Declaring he had run away from his "owner," Henry Birge, who got him as "boot" in a horse trade, Perry Farce, a white boy 12 years old, applied to Frank Emmett for a place to sleep the other night. He said he had formerly belonged to Tom Richey of Hart county, who took him four years ago, when his father died, and kept him until recently, when Richey and Birge swapped horses, Richey "throwing" the lad as "boot."



THE GREAT ENEMY ALCOHOL.

Destroys the Body and Shatters the Social Fabric.

That alcohol has an affinity for protoplasm, the "physical basis of life" itself, and that this is the reason for the widely varied injuries that it may inflict on the body, is asserted by Dr. Henry Smith Williams, in a series of articles contributed to McClure's Magazine. In the first, entitled "Alcohol and the Individual," Dr. Williams shows that the tissues of the brain, the nerves, the heart and blood vessels, the stomach and intestinal tract, the lymphatic system, the kidneys, and the liver, may each and all become diseased by the habitual drinking of even small quantities of alcohol. He notes also that these consequences are not confined to the drinker, but are passed on to his descendants of successive generations. All this, Dr. Williams tells us, may be compared to the eroding effect of a flowing stream, which has its greatest action on the part of its banks that is least restraint. So alcohol, circulating in the blood, tends to attack whatever organ or tissue may be weakest and most susceptible. Dr. Williams agrees with those who tend to class alcohol as a poison, and discards "the pernicuous theory" that it "gives any persistent increase of muscular power." He goes on:

"It is even questionable whether the energy derived from the oxidation of alcohol in the body can be directly used at all as a source of muscular energy. Such competent observers as Schumberg and Scheffer independently reached the conclusion that it can not. Dr. Abel inclines to the same opinion. He suggests that 'alcohol is not a food in the sense in which fats and carbohydrates are food; it should be defined as easily oxidizable drug with numerous untoward effects which inevitably appear when a certain minimum dose is exceeded. He thinks that alcohol should be classed 'with the more or less dangerous stimulants and narcotics, such as hasheesh, tobacco, etc., rather than with truly sustaining foodstuffs.'"

In its action on the brain, he goes on to say, alcohol is an inhibitor and disturber of mental activity, not a promoter of it. This he regards as definitely proven by the experiments of the chief German investigators. Its effect is cumulative, so that the drinker of a single bottle of wine daily "is in reality never actually sober." Wine causes a loss of at least ten per cent. in working efficiency. It is not only itself a poison, but aids the action of other poisons, such as those of contagion.

In his second article (December) Dr. Smith takes up the relations of alcohol and the community. Alcohol, as noted above, attacks the weakest point. Says the writer:

"But note now an important application. It is a fact familiar to every student of evolution that, generally speaking, the most unstable tissues of an organism are the ones most recently evolved; that is to say, the most highly developed and complex tissues. Being interpreted, this means that the most delicate and unstable of all organic tissues are the complex central nerve-cells of the gray cortex of the brain—the cells directly associated with the exhibition of mental processes. There are the most delicately poised, the most easily disturbed in function, of all organic tissues. It follows that these are the tissues that come earliest and most persistently under the influence of the alcoholic poison. A given individual may have a highly susceptible liver or kidney or heart, through hereditary influences or through some peculiarity of his environment; but, in general, the brain—the organ of mind—is the organ whose tissues are most susceptible. So when the dissecting knife reveals, post mortem, a hob-nailed liver or an alcoholic kidney, stomach, or heart, it will almost invariably reveal also a shrunken and 'watery' alcoholic brain. And in numberless cases in which all the other organs have seemed to present a granite-like resistance to the poison, the brain alone gives evidence of having yielded to the strain."

To be able to bear our own troubles is the secret of our ability to help those who are troubled.—Robertson.

CARE OF UTENSILS

CLEANLINESS AND ECONOMY IN THE KITCHEN.

A Little Consideration and Forethought Here Is Well Repaid—Proper Treatment of Tinware—To Clean Copper or Brass.

To Clean a Frying Pan—Rub with a hard crust of bread and wash with hot water and washing soda. Never scrub it or the next food fried in it will stick.

To Clean Enameled or Granite Utensils Whose Contents Have Been Allowed to Burn—Fill with cold water, add a piece of washing soda the size of an egg and heat to boiling point. Wash at once, as the burned parts will then be more easily cleaned.

Saucepans and baking dishes should be filled with cold water immediately after using, so as to prevent the fragments clinging to them. By doing this they may be cleansed in half the time otherwise required.

Tinware should be washed in hot soapy water, rinsed, then dried with a towel. Drying tinware on the stove darkens and sometimes melts it. If desired bright, first wash and then clean with either writing or some mineral soap, not with sand, as this will cut through the soft metal and soon wear it out.

Coffee pots should always be bright on the inside to insure good coffee. By occasionally boiling soap, water and washing soda in them they will be kept in an excellent condition.

To clean rusty and blackened knives and forks, use half a raw potato dipped in brick dust.

Stains on tinware or teacups can be removed by dipping a damp cloth in common soda and rubbing briskly. Wash and wipe dry.

Granitewear should not be left to dry over a hot fire, as the heat in expanding may cause the outside to scale.

To clean copper or brass, if it is very dirty, put some fine salt on a plate, dip into it a cut lemon, and rub on the metal. The strong acid will remove the worst stains.

Tumblers which have contained milk should be first rinsed in cold water before washing in hot water.

To Cook Rice to Perfection.

Wash two cups of rice in three waters, drain and dry. Have ready a good sized kettle in which are four quarts of boiling water. Slowly let rice sift through your fingers into the boiling water, never letting it stop boiling. Keep lid off kettle. Add tablespoonful of vinegar to whiten rice and to keep it from boiling over. When cooked tender, which will be in about 25 minutes, empty the contents of kettle into a colander which is placed over a bowl (the water from the rice making an excellent starch). Pour on and through the rice boiling water to remove the starchy stickiness, then place colander over the kettle of gently boiling water to steam for five minutes. Pour into hot dish and serve as a vegetable. If you once eat rice cooked this way, no other way will suit you.

Club House Salad.

Cook macaroni for about 20 minutes. Take from fire, drain in colander and wash through with cold water until thoroughly cold. Put in bowl; mix a rich mayonnaise, about a cupful; take about four hard-boiled eggs, carefully slice the whites and add to the macaroni; take the yolks and chop fine; add a portion of the mayonnaise until a thick paste is obtained. Drain a bottle of capers; add to the macaroni. Slice about two tomatoes when they are cold, or drain the juice from a can of same, and use the thick portion of the tomatoes just before serving the mayonnaise over the whole; slice a green pepper and also add powdered red pepper. Serve with lettuce leaves.

Baked White Fish.

Thoroughly clean the fish; cut out the backbone from the head to within two inches of the tail, and stuff with the following: Drain two cupfuls of oysters, mix with them one cupful of cracker crumbs, one tablespoonful finely chopped parsley, quarter cupful butter, salt and pepper. Season the fish with salt, pepper and lemon juice. Stuff with the oyster dressing and sew up with fine twine. Rub the fish over slightly with butter, place it in a baking pan, dot with butter and pour in a little hot water. Bake, allowing 12 minutes to the pound. Serve hot with parsley sauce.

Boston Pumpkin Pie.

Select a medium-sized pumpkin, solid substance, and dark orange color. Cook in water enough to prevent burning, which should be evaporated in the end to leave all the sweet flavors with the pulp. Then for a deep pie use one cupful pumpkin, a pinch of nutmeg, clove, and salt, one-quarter teaspoonful of cinnamon, one-half teaspoonful of ginger, with one-half cupful of sugar; add this to the pumpkin with one beaten egg, and three cupfuls of rich milk, which should be heated. Bake in a moderate oven about one hour.

Brambles.

One cup raisins chopped fine, (I grind mine in meat chopper), one lemon grated and a little of the juice, about one tablespoon of cracker crumbs (can grind these too), one egg and one-half cup of sugar. Mix thoroughly and bake in rich pie crust rolled very thin and cut in circles. Fold over same as for turnovers or put layer of filling and then a top crust. Cut in squares when cold. These are fine for luncheons or to carry for dinner. Be sure and have oven good and hot or they will be tough.

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY

Displacing a Bore.

"Christmas ain't what it useter be," sighed Amos Barker, cross-legged behind the grocery stove.

"What's the matter, Ame?" asked Hiram Wiggins, rubbing his cold hands before the open door of the heater, "didn't nobody give you a necktie ner a pair of slippers this Christmas?"

"I remember," continued Amos, disregarding the raillery, "one Christmas when I was a boy, I got a pair of copper-toed boots with red tops, a sled with a race-hoss picture on it, a sack of candy and peanuts, a pair of mittens knit by granny and—"

"And a lickin'," interrupted Hiram, "all in one day!"

"But now Christmas hez come and gone agin—an' the' land is full of sorrer and trouble. Th' trusts hez boosted th' cost of everything, and in Chicago th' price of turkeys fer New Year's is twenty-four cents a pound. Think of it, Hi., twenty-four cents a pound!"

"I see," said Henry Butts, joining the duet at the stove, "that Al. Hickson has married Nona Grubb, his step-mother's daughter."

"That makes Mrs. Hickson her stepson's mother-in-law," figured Hiram.

"And her own daughter's mother-in-law," added Henry.

"Let's see," estimated Al., "the bride is now her husband's step-sister, isn't she?" looking pointedly at Amos.

"As I was saying—" broke in Amos.

"Sure," cried Hiram, lighting his cob pipe, "and the groom is his wife's step-brother."

Th' trusts hez—" tried Amos again.

"And the groom's father is the father-in-law of his step-daughter," chimed Al., winking at Hiram.

"And—"

"Say," growled Amos, getting up suddenly, "be you fellers crazy er gist plain durn fools?" starting angrily toward the front door.

"A happy New Year to you, Amos," sung out Hiram as the door closed upon the pessimist.

"Haw, haw!" laughed Al. "Now, Hi., we'll have a nice little visit t'gether. What'd ye git fer Christmas?"

On the Wing.

"What is the shortest day?" asks an exchange. A holiday, of course.

Advertising For an Angel

By MARSHALL CROMWELL.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

Cranston picked up the locket and hurried after the girl, but during that moment in which he stooped to pick the jewel from the floor of the ferryboat she was swept away in the press of passengers.

He was certain that this particular girl had dropped the trinket, for he had left the ferryboat behind her and he had heard the tinkle of the locket as it struck the planks.

Cranston was decidedly interested in her. Once before he had seen her in a street car, and she had haunted his memory for days. On this occasion she had completed her conquest, and it was a man very much in love who had followed her from the boat in the hope that something might occur to enable him to speak to her.

He might save her from being run down in the traffic, or she might slip, or any one of a hundred things might happen which would break the ice of convention and permit Cranston to take the plunge into unconventionality.

And now something had happened, but to his dismay Cranston found that it did not profit him greatly, though perhaps in the long run it might. The locket was of gold, plainly chased and of no very great intrinsic value, but still it might be valued for its associations. Cranston opened the case and was dismayed to find there the picture of two small children.

It was just such a locket as a young matron might wear, and Cranston regarded the pictures dolorously. The girl did not suggest a matron, yet why else should she carry with her the pictures of two little children?

His hopes rose again when in answer to his advertisement he received a letter from Miss Eunice Remson, giving a detailed description of the locket and offering payment for the advertisement and a suitable reward.

Cranston performed a solemn dance emblematic of joy as he blissfully regarded the "Miss" written in parenthesis. At least he was not in love with a married woman.

He made all haste to reach the Remson home, and as he sat in the reception room waiting for Miss Remson he trembled with anticipation. By this time he was almost ready to throw himself at the feet of Miss Remson when she entered and cry, "Be mine!" like the hero of a novel.

He was glad when Miss Remson entered that he had checked his impulse, for she proved to be a sweet faced lady of perhaps fifty.

"You have brought the locket?" she asked as she motioned him to a seat. "I am very much indebted to you."

"But are you the owner?" he demanded. "I should like the pleasure of giving it to the owner."

"Unfortunately that is impossible," was the quiet reply. "Mrs. Weymer left for her home in the west last night."

"Mrs. Weymer!" Cranston's spirits sank again. After all, she was married. The children of the locket were her babies. After the hopes raised by the signature of "Miss Remson" the phrase "Mrs. Weymer" seemed doubly cruel.

"Mrs. Weymer is my niece," explained Miss Remson. "Here are pictures of my little grandnieces from which the miniatures in the locket were made. I presume that you will regard this as sufficient proof of ownership."

"It is entirely satisfactory," stammered Cranston as he delivered to the old lady the golden trinket on which he had built such hopes. "Don't speak of a reward," he added as he saw she was opening her purse. "The advertisement cost only a trifle."

"But it was in every paper," reminded Miss Remson. "We sent for all the papers in the hope of finding it in one of them at least, and then, through curiosity, we looked through them all."

"It was just a trifle," repeated Cranston vaguely. After the nature of the reward for which he had hoped mere money recompense seemed a mockery. He had advertised to find the girl of his heart, not to return the locket. It was absurd that Miss Remson should be made to pay for this dash into the realms of romance.

She was still regarding him with uncertainty when a light step sounded in the hall, and at Miss Remson's call of "Millicent" the girl of the ferry trip entered the room.

There could be no mistake, and Cranston could only spring to his feet and regard her in open mouthed astonment, which made him look remarkably foolish.

"This is Mr. Cranston, who found the locket," explained Miss Remson. "My niece, Millicent," she added in explanation to Cranston. "Miss Dutton doubly under obligations to you," added, "since she was wearing the locket when it was lost."

"I thought it was yours," declared Cranston, finding his tongue at last. "I ran after you and searched the crowd, but you seemed to have vanished into thin air."

"I missed it and went back on the boat to look for it," she explained. "It was mother's locket, and Sister Belle never would have forgiven me if it had been lost. She didn't know I was wearing it."

"I am very glad I found it," murmured Cranston, and there was a world of meaning in his tones.

"Mr. Cranston refuses to let me pay the cost of the advertising or to accept any recompense for his lost time," interrupted Miss Remson. "I don't know what to do."

"I do," cried the girl gayly. "Since he scorns filthy lucre he shall have tea instead. It's tea time, auntie, and I need a cup after all that shopping for Belle. I've walked miles and miles through the stores. It must be terrible to be married and have to shop for babies who need such a multitude of things."

And as she spoke she laid aside her hat and rang the bell for the servant. Cranston detested tea at any time, but most of all in the afternoon, yet he drank two cups very slowly, that it might last the longer.

At last even the excuse of tea was exhausted, and reluctantly he rose to leave. Vainly he had sought to learn of some common friend who might vouch for him, but he had not succeeded, and with laggard steps he turned toward the door. Miss Remson's voice arrested his movement.

"I've been wondering if you can be one of the Cressville Cranstons," she said inquiringly.

"From the very center of Cressville," he assented jubilantly. "I am the son of Arbaugh Cranston."

"How strange!" commented the old lady beamingly. "I spent a part of the summer in Cressville and had a delightful time. I know your mother very well. You must drop in some evening and get better acquainted."

Cranston looked into the girl's eyes and found there a confirmation of the invitation. "I shall be glad to," he said eagerly. "I—er—shall be at liberty tomorrow evening. If—that's—er—"

"We shall be delighted to see y declared Millicent, taking pity on confusion.

Her slim, firm hand lay in his for an instant, and then somehow Cranston found himself on the street again.

From his pockets he fished a number of colored slips, the receipts from the newspapers for the advertisement. Slowly he tore them across and let them flutter to the ground.

"And to think Miss Remson wanted to repay me," he commented—"repay me for advertising for an angel! I knew she couldn't be married," he added contentedly, "but she's going to be—to me."

Be Up to Date or Fail.

A physician tells me that he goes through his medical library every year and throws out a lot of books which have become useless to him because the new, the up to date, the more progressive, are pushing out the old.

We all know that some of the scientific books published are useless a year after they appear in print. There never was a time in the history of the world when the new in every line of endeavor crowded out the old as it does today.

If you examine your business thoroughly you will probably find old fogy methods, obsolete ideas and cumbersome ways of doing things—a lot of red tape in your methods.

Remember that nothing else is improving faster than business methods. If you are keeping books as they were kept a quarter of a century ago, if you are using the same business system, you will find that you are away behind the times.—Success Magazine.

Encouragement.

In a village in Scotland an old farmer sympathized one day with the complaints of an old friend of his, a peddler. The peddler said the times were always hard in Scotland; the people had no money there; it was a poor place to get along in.

"What you say is true," the farmer agreed. "Why don't you emigrate to Australia, Tavish? Australia's a grand place, by all accounts."

"It used to be," the other returned, "but it is so no longer. Australia is as overcrowded now as any other land."

"The coast may be," the farmer admitted, "but the interior, I'm sure, is not. Go to Australia, Tavish, and p into the interior."

"Hang the interior," said the dler. "There's nothing there but garoos."

The farmer thought that kang were some foreign race of p "Well, Tavish," he said reproach "isn't a kangaroo's money as go any other man's?"

LORIMER'S ELECTION BLOW TO OPPONENTS OF BOSSISM

Congressman Named to Succed Hopkins In Senate is Prince of Machine Politicians.

Washington, May 28.—Not in many years has Washington taken keener interest in a Senatorial fight in any State than has been brought to a climax by the election of William R. Lorimer as Senator from Illinois to succeed Albert J. Hopkins.

"Billy" Lorimer has had a most remarkable political career. When Deneen was nominated for Governor for the first time in the famous deadlocked convention at Springfield, Lorimer had made the best fight he knew how to nominate Frank O. Lowden. Lorimer went away from that convention a political bankrupt. A short while before he had suffered defeat for Congress in his Chicago district, and while he was retired only one term, yet it showed that he could be beaten. He put all his eggs into the Lowden basket and they went to smash. Lowden looked like another political wreck; but he turned around, ran for Congress in the Oregon (Ill.) districts and has been in the House ever since.

Lorimer was the bitter enemy of Deneen at the time. Somehow or other the Chicago boss and the Governor have made terms, and indications now are that they will work together to clean up Chicago and throw out the Busse organization. After that it is hard telling what they can do for Deneen. It is hardly probable that Deneen can be made Senator to succeed Cullom, because Illinois is strongly prejudiced against letting both Senators go to Chicago, and Deneen and Lorimer both live in the city. It is not impossible that Frank Lowden may come to the Senate as one result of the Lorimer victory.

But such an impossible combination as that which made Lorimer Senator may bring about almost anything. Lorimer and Deneen patched up their differences, but they could not control. Then they got enough Democrats into their combination to make a majority; and thus Lorimer stands as the non-partisan, or by-partisan, Senator. He represents both Republicans and Democrats; machine and reform politics. Deneen has been regarded as a reformer; but his combination with Lorimer makes him also and decidedly the practical politician.

It all means revolution in Illinois. There has been a powerful protest in that State against machine politics; but Lorimer is the prince of the machine politicians. As a member of Congress he carried the fights of the Chicago packers against the pure food and meat inspection laws. The Republican and independent press of Chicago has been in the main anti-Lorimer for years, and his election is a hard blow to the effects for the relief from bossism. Lorimer has been accepted as the friend of the big interests in Chicago traction and other like matters; and, as a Senator, he will represent the annexation of a powerful influence to the Aldrich organization.

Lorimer came to Congress 14 years ago. He has not become much acquainted among members of the House; he seldom takes a hand in discussion on the floor. Nobody in Washington knows whether he can make a speech, for he never tries it. He seldom manifests any particular interest in legislation, but at times he busies himself and then proves a skilled and effective worker. He made a good part of the fight against the legislation for labeling oleomargarine; and when the meat-inspection fight came on he was one of the members of the House Committee on Agriculture who led in the opposition.

He defied President Roosevelt, the Chicago press and a powerful public opinion, but he came back to the House in due time. He has always been looked upon in Washington, as a person of some consideration simply because it was known that he was a power in Chicago; but he might have remained in the House a half century and never rise to any recognition on account of anything in his service on the floor or in committees. Many times the question has been asked in profound wonder why Lorimer wanted to stay in Congress.

As a politician, Lorimer's strong faculty has been combination, working especially with Democrats. At this he has succeeded many times, to the wonderment and confusion of his opposition. Before the preseut Illinois primary law passed he was always able to control a vast Democratic vote in the Republican primaries came around Lorimer Republicans would assist the Democrats in turn, in naming candidates satisfactory to the managers of both parties.

Lorimer has had many ups and downs. But for a man who began as an immigrant from England, never had any book education, and has been streetcar conductor, small contractor and everything else on the way up, he has done right well. He has made a fortune out of contracting.

JASPER AUGUSTINE ENCOUNTERED SNAKE

Big Reptile of New Species Sprang at Buggy and Wound Around Wheel.

Addison, May 21.—Startled by a huge snake which sprang out from the roadside and wrapped itself around the wheel of their buggy and stopped the wheel's revolution, Jasper Augustine of Uniontown and his son John had a rather thrilling experience which occurred Thursday when they were driving from the Augustine country home near Addison to Confluence, where Jasper boarded the train to return to Uniontown.

The snake was about five feet long and had a body very thick and heavy. The two men were driving down hill and suddenly the snake jumped from a little ditch and coiled itself around the wheel and its great strength and weight almost stopped the buggy. John struck the reptile with his whip several heavy blows and the horse pulled the the buggy ahead and with the snake's entanglement in the wheel and the beating from John's whip its life was cut short.

This snake was of a new species that no one around Addison remembers having seen before two years ago. However quite a number of them have been seen in the last two years, but no one has been bitten by them and it is not known whether their bite is poisonous or not. They are usually from four and a half to five feet in length and are very thick. They have a red head, green eyes, short legs and web feet and are great jumpers, usually spring eight or ten feet.

These reptiles seem to be vicious and will jump at any person or object that comes near them. Two years ago one of them jumped at Jasper Augustine's son Ross and caught his trousers near the knee and clung there tenaciously and the boy ran two miles before he was able to get the snake's hold released. Addison people are wondering what kind of snakes these are and are on the watch to guard against them.

Sight For Elk.

At a county fair out in Kansas a man went up to a tent where some elk were on exhibition, and stared wistfully up at the sign. "I'd like to go in there," he said to the keeper "but it would mean to go in without my family, and I cannot afford to pay for my wife and 17 children.' The keeper stared at him in astonishment. "Are all those your children?" he gasped. "Every one," said the man. "You wait a minute," said the keeper, "I'm going to bring the elk out and let them see you all."—Argonaut.

FEEDING THE AMERICAN ARMY.

"Every great general," says the Scientific American, "who has maneuvered a large fighting force has discovered the truth of Napoleon's declaration that 'an army travels on its stomach; and to more than one has come the bitter realization that the best army that has the best stomach. There is nothing which so completely withers patriotism and smothers courage as the gnawing pain of indigestion; therefore, the feeding of an army has been given as much study as its equipment as a destroying force."

The amount of food required for ten days' rations of the American army is graphically shown in a diagram presented by the publication above quoted, in which are enumerated the following amounts of the staples of consumption, in pounds: Corn meal, 875,000; beef; 875,000; canned meat, 700,000; bacon, 525,000; pickled fish, 787,500; potatoes, 560,000; sugar, 40,000; coffee, 70,000; dried fruit, 70,000; beans, 105,000, and onions, 70,000. If this much food is required to feed the army for ten days, think of the enormous quantity (more than thirty-six times as much) consumed in a year.

The Scientific American, in its article on this subject, gives the following additional particulars:

"In the superiority of food, based on the cost of the ration, the American army stands far ahead of the other armies of the world; in fact, there is no comparison whatever between the American rations and that of any other country on the globe. The cost of the American rations is nearly one hundred per cent greater than the British army ration, and none of the other countries with big military establishments feeds its soldiers anywhere nearly as expensively as the English government does.

"The American army ration is divided into three kinds: Garrison ration, field ration, and emergency ration. The garrison ration is given soldiers at regulary established military posts; field ration. that issued to troops in the field in active campaign. The emergency ration, in which the best and most valuable nutritive elements are combined in the smallest bulk. In composition the garrison and field ration are almost identical. Each ration, which is supposed to keep the soldier for one day, furnishing breakfast, dinner and supper consists of 20 ounces of fresh beef or mutton, 12 ounces of bacon, 16 ounces of canned meat 14 ounces of dried fish or 18 ounces of pickled fish, 18 ounces of flour or 20 ounces of cornmeal, either 2 2-5 ounces of beans or peas, or 1 3-5 of rice or hominy, and either 16 ounces of potatoes or 12 4-5 ounces of either onions or tomatoes, 1 3-5 ounces of dried fruit, 1 2-5 ounces of coffee, and 3 1-5 ounces of sugar. The ration also includes very small quanities of vinegar, salt, pepper, soap and candles.

"The army ration, it will be seen, contains none of those things which are ordinarly considered luxuries. For instance, there is no milk included in the ration, and the soldier must take his coffee black unless he is able to purchase a can of condensed milk from the 'sale store' with his 'savings.' Congress has authorized the commissary department to keep on hand other articles of food that are not included in the regular ration. These are kept in the 'sale stores,' and are issued to the mess steward in return for 'savings' from the regular rations. Out of a company of a hundred men, there are a number who do not eat all the articles in the ration. These would be wasted if drawn by the mess stewart; therefore, when the thousand rations are issued to him, he returns to the commissary that part of the various components that he thinks will not be used. This, in the language of the army, is making a 'saving' on the rations.

"The value of the articles returned to the commissary is computed, and the mess steward is allowed to draw from the 'sales stores' a sufficent quantity of luxuries that are not in the regular issue, equal to the value of his 'saving.' The government, however, will not allow a 'saving' to be made on certain articles in the ration. Fresh meat, dried or preserved fish, potatoes, onions, tomatoes, prunes, apples, and peaches must be used; a 'saving' can not be made on these articles. They contain just the proper nutritive elements, and the quantities given are what the normal soldier should eat."

TO REALIZE MORE FROM COAL LAND.

New Plan for Disposing of Government Property is Announced.

Washington, May 27.—A new plan for the disposal of the coal lands on the public domain of the United States, that will net more than twice the former returns to the government was announced by Secretary Ballinger of the department of the interior today. The prices of the coal lands bought by the United States, except Alaska, which is governed by a different law, have been increased all along the line.

The plan announced today is expected to end the dispute started by the withdrawal by President Roosevelt of 68,000,000 acres of coal land in the west. It is a further development of the classification plan set in action by former Secretary of the Interior James R. Garfield and is to be carried out in more accurate and scientific lines. The Ballinger plan will secure to the government more than ten times the amount of money secured by the sale of coal lands before Garfield went into office.

Secretary Ballinger has had the coal lands on the public domain classified with reference to both the quality and quanity of coal underlaying the soil. They will be sold on this basis, with the prevaling royalties per ton that are usually paid private owners as a fundamental price.

The coal lands which were withdrawn by Secretary Garfield are being examined by experts of the geological survey as fast as their values is determined.

The present ruling will increase the price of the most valuable coal lands from $100 per acre, under the Garfield plan, to more than $300 per acre under the Ballinger plan.

Before Garfield took office, all coal land were sold at the minimum provided by law, not lower than $10 and not higher than $20 per acre. Coal lands worth millions of dollars were disposed of under this lanp.

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, JUNE 3, 1909.

POLITICAL ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Candidates for nomination on the Republican ticket are invited to annonnce themselves through this medium. For this service a flat rate of $5 tor each announcement, covering the publication in this column until the nominations are made, has been fixed. The cash should accompany the order.

FOR HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the nomination for member of the House of Delegates, subject to the decision of the Republican Convention, and earnestly solicit the support of my friends throughout the county. If nominated and elected I promise my best endeavors for the advancement of the interests of the people of Garrett county. W. W. SAVAGE.

Friendsville, March 30, 1909.

MEMORIAL DAY.

Year by year the ranks grow thinner, year by year the steps more slow of that great army, many of whose comrades, to use the immortal words of "Stonewall" Jackson, have "crossed the river and rest beneath the shade of the trees." But with them march the men of the new generation and the children who will be the men and women of the future. Who they are and what they did will never be forgotten. With each returning new birth of the year, as springing grass and budding flowers cover the earth with beauty and speak of enduring life, their countrymen gather to plant the flag upon every mound where sleep the soldier dead, to cover their graves with blossoms, and assure the living that they will be held in immortal remembrance.

"On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
While glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead."

INDEFENSIBLE.

James A. Patten puts away from himself blame for the high price of wheat and flour today, and bread itself tomorrow, with a weak show of simple motives and guiltless acts. He foresaw a wheat supply short of the breadeater's demands for their food, he explained, his air a grandiose loftiness above feeling petty injuries from false report, and he bought most loads of the grain sent to market on the way. When the millers' bins were nearly empty and the new wheat was needed for the bakers' flour, the millers had to buy of him. He did not ask a Shylock's price of them. There was enough wheat to go around. In their eagerness to obtain a part, ever so small a part, of his supply, they of their own free will offered him prices well above the past average figures, and they are still climbing one above the other, these ardent rivals for his wheat. He merely takes their money.

But suppose last summer he had been the owner of a city's water supply in that severe drough, and he had held the water for what the parched people frantically bid him, each crazy to get all possible water for the wife and the children. The people's anger against that heartless villainy could hardly have found a vent within the law. But, woe to him, it would have found a vent. And the next human necessity to water is bread. Persons do not dare take either from the criminals undergoing the hardest punishment dealt in modern times.

BLACK LINE "EMBLEM."

The Democrats passed a law forbidding the printing of emblems or other devices to aid voters in marking their ballots for the party of their choice. Having done this they promptly introduced the heavy black guide line under the names of Democratic candidates. Former Attorney General Bryan, a staunch Democrat, denounced it as a bare-face fraud clearly in violation of the law forbidding the use of emblems. Governor Crothers will be asked to put this dodge up to Attorney General Straus, for an official opinion on the subject. He will also be asked to pass upon the practice of certain Democratic Supervisors of making up the form and arrangements of the ballott without the knowledge and supervision of the Republican member.

THE DEATH PENALTY.

Pennsylvania's legislature recently passed a law under which it would have been possible for juries in murder cases to decide whether persons whom they had found guilty should be sentenced to be hanged or to spend their lives in prison. When the bill came before Gov. Stuart for consideration, he vetoed it. And this is the reason that he gave:

"In view of the disregard of human life which some elements of our population continually exhibit, I do not think that our criminal law governing the punishment for murder in the first degree should be relaxed."

It any one outside of Pennsylvania had so indicted the people of that state, doubtless the governor would have been among the first to call him to account. It may perhaps be true, in the case of the Keystone state, that the people are not yet ready, on account of the wickedness of "some elements" of the population, to abandon capital punishment as a relic of the dark ages, but it is certain that elsewhere throughout the country the tendency is in that direction. Capital punishment has been abolished in at least five states of the Union and in a number of others juries are permitted to decide between it and life imprisonment. Maine, Michigan, Rhode Island, Kansas and Wisconsin, the states in which executions are not legally sanctioned, are not generally considered more lawless than the other commonwealths of the Union; on the contrary, they are showing most plainly that we have some very foolish notions regarding the value of punishment as a crime deterrent. And one of these notions is that entertained by the governor of Pennsylvania.

PREPARING FOR CAMPAIGN.

The Republican State Committee met in Baltimore on Wednesday and fixed August 25 as the date for holding a State Convention and also named the dates for primary elections in all the counties of the State for the election of delegates to this convention. It is expected that the local committees will name the same date for the nomination of county tickets and thus save the expense of two primaries. Under the new primary election law any voter desiring to be chosen a delegate to a County Convention must give notice to the State Central Committee for the county in writing stating his name, occupation and address. The polls may be kept open between the hours of 8 a. m. and 6 p. m., and must be kept open not less than four hours. The voting will take place in each precinct. The member of the State Central Committee for the county shall meet at the court house on Tuesday following the primaries and canvass the returns. The Republicans will generally follow the convention plan and the delegates so chosen will meet and make nominations and elect delegates to the State Convention in the usual way. The attendance at the meeting was large and deep interest in the approaching Amendment fight. Resolutions were adopted calling attention to the handicap imposed upon the Republican voters in the so-called Wilson counties where the publication of sample ballots is prohibited while the black line is used to guide Democratic voters. This unfair and dishonest scheme will be met in counties where where there is no reasonable prospect of electing Republican candidates by naming "bobtail" tickets in order to register as many votes as possible against the Amendment.

MOTHER LOVE AND PRAYERS.

No man of sound mind and of normally humane spirit would do what a stranger, "dressed in clerical garb," is reported to have done last Monday in Hagerstown, in a house of mourning, according to a dispatch published in The Sun.

In this house lay the body of a boy five years old, who had been killed in a railroad yard in Hagerstown. Into the presence of the mother, bereft of her child and suffering as only a mother can suffer, this man was admitted, because, he said he wanted to offer a prayer for the dead. If it had been his purpose to add to the sorrow of that mother, to stretch her heart strings beyond endurance, he could not have employed a more effective method He thanked God in has prayer, it is stated, for taking the boy away, saying that that it was far better that he should die and not grow up to be a sinful man. It is strange that any mother hearing such an invocation should be overcome by emotion and be prostrated physically? She expected a message of sympathy and consolation. She heard the voice of one praising God for the death of her child. Only a person of disordered mind could have so outraged human sensibilities and so torn a mother's heart.

In the mind of the unbalanced man who bronght additional agony to a mother's heart there was a thought, however, which has found lodgment in the minds of not a few men and women. That thought is based upon the fear that youth is beset by so many temptations that even when children are reared under the best enviorment the outcome is uncertain. But the healthy view, and the hopeful and encouraging view, is that as the twig is bent so the tree will be inclined. Home training must be relied upon to fortify the child against temptation, to it in the fundamental principles of integrity and of clean living. The mother can do this as no other agency, and, whatever the environment of her children, she will be in the future, as she has been in the past, the greatest instrumentality for molding the character of the youth of the nation. Innumerable mothers do this in every station of life and they constitute today the greatest force for righteousness which the world possesses. The world is very evil and full of pitfalls, but a mother's love and prayers follow her children like guardian angels, saving them from many snares and raising them when they fall.—Baltimore Sun.

MEMORAL DAY AT DEER PARK.

Was Celebrated at that Town on Last Saturday, May 29th.

Memorial Day was observed at the village of Deer Park on May 29th, and services at the cemetery, and in the village were of an interesting character.

Dr. C. W. Hudson, Baptist Minister, delivered an oration at the cemetery and an address filled with matters of interest in the village.

The Chairman Mr. George W. Haulenbeek, spoke as follows:

"Our meeting here to day is to honor and perpetuate the memory of our illustrious dead. War is indeed an awful thing, and it is gratifying to observe that efforts are being made throughout the civilized world, to banish it altogether, by resorting, in all cases of disputes between nations, to settlement by arbitration.

"I had the honor to serve in the Civil War in the 13th New Jersey Volunteers, and only a few days since, down in old Virginia, another New Jersey regiment erected a monument to its heroic dead, and every possible assistance and attention was shown to the visitors from the North, by a committee of Confederate veterans. What more can we desire by way of reconciliation than to note this beautiful tribute of sincerity and good feeling. Ours is inded a re-united country, and our lesson to day is to enlarge our devotion to the land in which we live for which the Union soldiers gave so much.

"One of the interesting events of the War of the Rebellion was the transportation of two army corps of the Army of the Potomac to the Army of the Cumberland. Secretary of War Stanton placed the matter in the hands of the late John W Garrett, then Paesident of the Baltimore and Ohio, and he accomplished the great feat without a single accident. Seven states were traversed and the journey consumed as many days.

"Let us consider for a moment the many ways in which the farmer is benefitted by the railroad; how his land is made more valuable by the proximity of the iron horse, and the farmer should be in accord with that which does so much to his advantage and profit.

"Over fivehundred million dollarshave been invested in railroads, and to make war upon them is indeed short sighted. Ever since the late financial depression, and even before it, many members of Congress have shown a desire to frame and urge the passage of bills that have been aimed at railroads; bills that were not drawn to advance and help the great arteries of the country, but rather intended to pull down and destroy. If you negotiate for the purchase of a farm, you do not at once propound the inquiry as to its area, but you do ask how near it is to a railroad. Farm lands adjacent to the B. & O. are much more valuable than land remote from its various lines, so that the influence of the farmer should be exerted upon his member of the Legislature to urge him to desist in the preparation and passage of bills that may be properly classed as restrictive legislation.

"Not only in Congress do we find this spirit of repugnance to corporations, but in State legislative bodies, and we can do much to inaugurate a better condition of things by suggesting to our delegates who will take their seats in our own Legislature in January next that it is nowise to continue the policy of presenting and advocating measures hostile to the railroads. Legislation should be of a class and character to build up and not to pull down.

"The railroads of the country have been the subject of attacks for years, and particularly during the past four years, on the question of freight rates. The average legislator seems to regard rate making as an arbitrary fixing of charges, for the sole benefit of the roads, and for favored shippers, whereas, the subject of rate making is really a science, just as exact as any of the sciences. Rate making is regulated by conditions, among which are competition, character of freight, cost of handling and the nature of the country. All these things must be taken into consideration, and this is something that the legislator in his effort to compel the railroads to do impossible things, does not seem to grasp.

"The railroad is the great civilizer. It is a corporation, but corporations after all are really only a number of men working through legal entity, a real substance, under laws which the people themselves have enacted.

"All that corporations ask is to be accorded the same privileges which each individual asks, subject, of course, to the laws of the state and of the country."

Miss Sada Laugnlin presided at the organ and the choir of Deer Park young ladies received much applause for singing.

William D. Hoye, who serverd in the Confederate Army, made a ringing speech and held the attention of the very large audience. He also received a round of applause.

The Deer Park Cornet band played well.

Geo. Marley, John L. Wheeler and other Union veterans of the Civil was were on the platform.

In the afternoon a game of base ball was played by the Deer Park and Terra Alta nines resulting in a victory for the former by a score of 5 to 10.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Monday last all trains commenced to stop at our station for the season and almost every train brings more of less to our mountain city.

Mrs. McCourtney, of Washington, D. C., is now domiciled in the Collins cottage, corner of G street and Oakland drive.

Mr. John P. Hillis, the singing evangelist, and wife, are in the Mrs. Rudisill cottage on E street. Mr. Hillis may purchase and improve the cottage and make it his permanent summer home.

Col. J. M. Burns arrived here Tuesday. He had been preceded by Mrs. Burns and daughter.

Mrs. J. A. Enlow and daughters Daisy, Lois and Gertrude, are at home in the J. B. Allen cottage, corner of H street and Baltimore avenue.

Mrs. R. B. Nelson and family, of Hillsboro, Ohio, arrived yesterday morning and will occupy the Baumgartner cottage the present season.

The Bell telephone is being extended into the eastern part of the Park. The Mrs. Rachel Weems cottage and others will be connected.

Miss Minor, engaged in home missionary work, was the guest of Mrs. Fanny L. Sperry over Sunday. She favored the Epworth League Sunday evening with an interesting address and a well rendered solo.

Capt. G. W. Harrison and Mr. D. F. Graham, of Piedmont, W. Va., were here Tuesday arranging for the entertainment of a large party of publishers from New York city. They will arrive here on special cars on the 12th, and remain several days, driving from here to nearby points of interest. The party will take dinner at Mr. Joseph Conneway's Sunday.

Superintendent Davis was with friends in Piedmont Monday.

Rev. N. Hart and wife, who have been residents of the Park and Loch Lynn for a number years, will go to Morgantown, W. Va., next week where they expect to make their future home.

Mr. Bryson Welch has been lying unconscious at his home here since Friday last. He cannot survive many days

About ten cars of gas pipe have been unloaded and stacked here during the past few days. Thirty car loads will be brought to this point.

"Cheap John" opened up Monday with a large stock of goods. The stand will meet this season every need of the hungry, from sandwiches and coffee to ice cream and cake. The lines of fruits and confections will be large and of the very best.

Mrs. Bolton will arrive here this evening. She has almost fully recovered from the critical and painful operation undergone in Wheeling about a month since.

Miss Nellie Dawson, who had been critically ill for two months, is able to take short walks.

The drug store force, Messrs. Gonder and West, are taking their meals at Haydenhurst.

It was decided by the trustees to paint the M. E. church.

Childrens' Day services will be held here Sunday, June 13th, at 10.30 a. m. An interesting program is being rehersed for the occasion. Everybody invited to be present.

Mr. L. P. Carr had a fine carriage and riding horse brought from Fairmont for the use of his family during the summer.

Hon. Philip Willett is still confined to his cottage suffering from gout.

Rev. Lee returned from his European trip, arriving at his home here yesterday morning.

Rev. J. L. B. Jones was here this week to secure a cottage for his family for the season.

Rev. J. H. Enlow was here several days this week looking after the interests of his cottage which is occupied by Miss Ettie Springer as a boarding house.

Mrs. L. B. C. List, who will again manage the Loch Lynn hotel, arrived here Tuesday from Washington city accompanied by a large corps of assistants. The hotel will at once be put in the best possible condition for guests.

The electric light plant was put into operation Tuesday evening. The plant is in charge of John D. Hayden.

Quite an excitement was occasioned in Chautauqua Park about eleven o'clock Saturday night by the shrill cry of murder in a feminine voice. A number in the immediate neighborhood gathered but as the policeman was not of the number no arrests were made until Monday when a man and wife and a gay young man (neither of whom belonged in the Park) were arrested by Officer Cuppett and taken before Police Justice West, of Oakland, and heavily fined.

Preaching in the M. E. church Sunday at 11.00 a. m. by the pastor.

Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Williams, who had been away from the Park for two weeks returned to their cottage Saturday evening.

Mrs. M. E. Hank and daughter Myra, of Washington, D. C., came to the Park last Friday afternoon and are domiciled in the Hank cottage.

Rev. J. O. Bolton and Mr. H. N. Cuppett represented our League at the convention at Blaine, W. Va. last week.

Miss Lillie Hagans, of Morgantown, is at the Park looking over properties with the purpose of purchasing a summer home.

Mr. Ira McKee, of Pittsburg, Pa., arrived here this morning having ridden through on horseback.

Mr. Albert Brenneman and wife, of Bittinger, Md., were here on their annual visit to the parents of Mrs. B., Mr. and Mrs. A. Lindeman. Mr. Brenneman is a farmer and a carpenter and between the two he is kept busy the year round. He is a fine young man and has a promising future before him.—Salisbury Star.

A novel wedding took place on the Maryland side of the Potomac river, opposite Gormania, on Sunday, the ceremony being performed in the presence of a large crowd. The bridal pair—Mr. Charles Miller, of Gormania, and Miss Cora Gunk, of Bayard—stood on a high bluff, surrounded by foliage, while Rev. E. P. Idleman performed the ceremony.

Mrs. J. W. Ramsey, of Baltimore, who arrived in Oakland last Thursday and was the guest of her cousin, Mrs. S. E. Shirer, on Alder street, left Tuesday for Grafton and Fairmont, where she will visit relatives for several weeks. Mrs. Ramsey will return to Oakland and spend the summer as the guest of Mrs. Shirer.

The West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company at Luke will commence the using of natural gas to run that plant as soon as the connection can be made with the main pipe line which will have to be built for a distance of four miles from Luke. Work on the same will commence next Monday. This plant has been using about four hundred tons of coal every twenty-four hours.

Mrs. Mary Gonder and three daughters, Misses Kate, Anna and Eugenia, will leave Oakland about the middle of the present month for Butte, Montana, where they expect to reside permanently and in which city Mrs. Gonder's two sons, Messrs. Bernard and Francis, are now located, the former in the employ of the Great Northwestern Railroad and the latter engaged in the sheep business.

The premises surrounding the jail and sheriff's residence has been improved recently by Sheriff Brown and several trusties. All rubbish which accumulated during the winter have been removed and the place given a general cleaning up. The grass plot fronting the side and front of the buildings is very beautiful and the sheriff takes pride in keeping it so.

Companies E and F of the second Battalion of Engineers comprising nearly 350 officers and enlisted men with women of their families passed through here on a second section of B. & O. train No. 7, Saturday night on their way from Washington to San Francisco. The train was made up of 12 cars and went through to Chicago where it was turned over to the Great Western road.

On Saturday, June 12, the West Virginia Pulp and Paper Compay will send a special car of expert printers and publishers of newspapers and magazines from New York, to inspect the plant at Luke. The party will be in charge of Mr. H. Frank Harrison. They will also visit Oakland and make a trip to Table Rock to view the magnificent mountain scenery and eat a good country dinner.

Rev. E. Manges left Oakland last night on train No. 1 for Richmond, Ind., when he will spend the greater portion of the next two weeks attending the General Synod of the Ev. Lutheran church, Rev. Manges being the ministerial delegate from the Allegany Conference, to which the Oakland congregation is attached. Mr. Manges was joined at Oakland by Mr. John T. Sincell, of Keyser, W. Va., who was elected as the lay delegate from this conference to the Synod.

Some Wheat.

C. H. Jennings, Esq., one of the most extensive lumber manufacturers in Maryland and West Virginia, owning and operating large plants in both states, is also possibly the largest wheat grower east of the Ohio river. Mr. Jennings owns and operates a large and valuable farm near his lumber plant, in this county, on which he has in one field eighty acres of wheat. The crop looks fine and promises from thirty to forty bushels to the acre. He also has a field of oats of sixty acres, besides large acreages in other crops. Mr. Jennings is a wide awake and enterprising citizen, and fully appreciates the possibilities of this county, from an agricultural stand point.

A party of Wheeling ladies and gentlemen arrived in Oakland last Saturday and on Tuesday departed overland for a journey through the Valley of Virginia, going via the old Northwestern Turnpike. Those in the party were Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Ott, Mr. and Mrs. L. C. Ott and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Burdett Hart, the latter one of the foremost newspaper men of the state.

Invitations have been issued by Dr. and Mrs. J. Lockhart Campbell, of Mountain Lake Park, for the wedding of their daughter, Miss Gertrude Madison, to Mr. William Vernon Thraves, the ceremony to occur at Braethorn, Mountain Lake Park, on Wednesday evening, June 16th, at six o'clock. The bride-elect is a very charming young lady and is a general favorite among her host of admirers and friends.

Quite a pleasant afternoon was spent on Sunday, May 30th, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hardesty, on Liberty street, when they entertained quite a number of relatives and friends, namely, Mr. and Mrs. A. Bennett Cunningham, of Pittsburg; Mr. and Mrs. Wm. J. Sowers and daughter Marie, of Pleasant Valley; Mr. and Mrs. John A. Sowers, of Oakland; Mr. George F. Temple, of Baltimore, and Mr. Frederick A. Sowers, besides a number of other visitors.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. HUMORS OF THE CHASE

How Louis Vansickle Fought A Cantankerous Deer.

The hunt sometimes took a semi-humorous turn, and a man of the rough training that came to a hunter found much amusement in such incidents as that which follows:

"In February of the year 1800," says Browning, "Louis Vansickle and myself went into the laural swamps, where all the deer had taken shelter from a snow which had fallen to the depth of four feet generally on the highlands.

"As we drew near the edge of the swamp, we discovered the roads made by the deer, which had been out of the thicket, browsing on the small bushes and eating the moss that had fallen from the timber.

"We had pursued these paths but a short distance when we observed seven large deer running, or rather jumping up and down; the snow being so deep that they could advance no more than three or four feet at a jump.

"We pursued at our best speed, which was about as fast as I could walk on dry land; for we had snowshoes tied fast under our moccasins, which were nearly as large as the seat of a chair.

"On, and on we went; but finally I proved too long-winded for Vansickle, and left him far behind.

"When I drew near the hindmost deer the foremost ones being tired out, had stopped to take breath. The last one attempting to pass by those in front, leaped into the deep snow, where he stuck fast, when I caught hold of him, with the intention of tying him; but he was too fat and strong for me, as the snow had not been long on the ground.

"He was also ill-natured, and fought viciously until Louis came up, who had a hawk-bill knife in his pocket. I took this knife, and with it cut the throat of the buck, and left him with my companion.

"With the knife in my pocket, I ran after and soon overtook the others, as they were crossing a small branch with steep banks on each side. A large tree, which had fallen over the stream, lay a short distance from the ground, and many leaves had drifted under it.

"One of the bucks, being hard pushed and greatly frightened, threw himself under this log among the leaves, and thus escaped my notice, as I was watching the deer in front of him.

"I passed by, and, after pursuing the others some distance, caught a very large buck, which I undertook to tie; but he fought me so desperately, and was so strong that I could not handle him.

"While I was engaged with that buck, hearing Louis halloing behind me, I seized the animal, cut his throat, and ran to the relief of my friend; thinking as I ran that he had fallen among the rocks and broken his leg, as the ground over which I had passed was very rocky and full of holes.

"I was soon agreeably disappointed, however, for as I came in sight of him I observed him lying on his back, with his knees drawn up toward his face and his great snowshoes turned up to the sun; the snow having drifted so deep in the hollow that he could not touch bottom with his hands.

"Before him stood one of the largest bucks, with his tail spread and all his hair bristled up, watching poor Louis; and every time he moved the buck would spring on him and beat him over the head and face with his feet until Louis became quiet again; when the buck would take his stand again until my friend made another move, and then he would repeat the same performance.

"I took the animal by the ear, and told Louis to let him go, and I would cut his throat. But he refused, saying that he was determined never to lose his hold until one or the other should be dead.

"I did so, when all the blood flowed over him, and a bloodier man I never have seen during my life. But he retained his hold until the buck was dead."

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts [illegible] by authorities at Valparaiso. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.—Stephens met a motley crew, to which he was assigned. He gave them final instructions.

CHAPTER V.—They successfully captured the vessel supposed to be the Esmeralda, through strategy.

CHAPTER VI.—Capt. Stephens gave directions for the departure of the craft.

CHAPTER VII.—He entered the cabin and discovered the English woman and her maid.

CHAPTER VIII. — Stephens quickly learned the wrong vessel had been captured. Lord Darlington's private yacht, the lord's wife and maid being aboard. He explained the situation to her ladyship.

CHAPTER IX.—Then First Mate Tuttle laid bare the plot, saying that the Sea Queen had been taken in order to go to the Antarctic circle.

CHAPTER X.—Tuttle explained that on a former voyage he had learned that the Donna Isabel was lost in 1753. He had found it frozen in a huge case of ice on an island and contained much gold.

CHAPTER XI.

In Which I Explain to Her Ladyship.

I gazed directly into his bullying eyes with a depth of contempt I made no slightest effort to disguise. Then I arose deliberately to my feet.

"Anderson, pluck that knife out and put it back in your belt."

"I'm damned if—"

"Do as I say quick, you surly brute," I interrupted, sternly. "Not another word. I'm in command here yet, and you'll obey orders, or I'll make you."

He understood I meant it, with his innate cowardice plainly apparent, yet did not yield until Tuttle interfered with a sarcastic laugh.

"The captain isn't exactly the sort to be handled in that kind o' way, Bill," he said, smoothly. "He's a deep-water sailor, not a land-shark, but I guess he's likely ready enough by this time to say what he's willin' to do."

The entire situation seemed to unroll before me like a panorama as I stood there, hastily making up my mind for action. I was afloat on the high seas, absolutely powerless to resist the set purpose of these men surrounding me, all rendered desperate by greed. Much as I despised Anderson, I comprehended that his threat was no idle one; nor did I possess a single comrade on board who would stand at my back. I was utterly alone; nay, worse even than alone—with two women dependent upon me. If I outwardly agreed with these rascals, and thus retained semblance of command over them, I might possibly preserve all our lives; I could, at least for the the present, protect the women from insult, perhaps from danger.

"Well, Mr. Tuttle," I said, quietly, "I may as well return you my answer one time as another. I don't give a tinker's damn for Anderson's threats, and I don't altogether put much faith in your yarn. But perhaps it's worth taking a chance at. What is to be my authority on board, providing I agree to go with you?"

"You're the captain."

"Absolutely in command?"

He shifted about, appearing a trifle disconcerted under my rapid questioning.

"Well, yes; in everything concernin' the discipline an' sailin' of the yacht," he explained. "There won't be no fuss about that job, sir. But we ain't a regular articled crew, bein' that we're all here on shares in the enterprise, an' so, as regards the purpose of the voyage, it'll have to be decided by majority vote. However, that don't need make no trouble."

"What is to be my share if you find the treasure?"

He thrust his head out of the window nearest him, looking up and down the deck; then he leaned across the table toward me, lowering his voice until it was little more than whisper.

"You get one-fifth, sir; the four of us here get one-fifth each; the other fifth is to be divided among the crew. Ain't that fair enough, sir?"

"It would appear so; yet there is still another matter of some importance to be decided first. There are two women on board; how about them?"

"What!" The vibrant excitement of his high-pitched nasal voice was echoed by the others.

"This steam-yacht we have stolen was the property of the earl of Darlington," I explained. "Lady Darlington and her maid are still on board, in the cabin aft."

This unexpected and undesirable information seemed fairly to stun the fellows, their eyes meeting blankly. I heard Bill Anderson swear.

"The question is, how can we best dispose of them? This is no excursion for ladies, no pleasure trip of any kind, we've started on. Shall we hail some passing vessel and trans-ship them, or shall we run in to Juan Fernandez and put them both safely ashore?"

None of the three men ventured to glance toward me, and for a long moment no answering voice spoke. Then Tuttle gave oily utterance to words of compromise.

"Blame if this don't sort o' knock me all out, sir," he acknowledged, "I don't exactly cotton to either of those idees of yours, an' I don't know what is best. I guess I'll have to talk it over with my mates here first, but you can tell them ladies that we'll get 'em out somehow before we turn south. Anyhow, they don't need to worry none 'bout bein' ill-treated. Then I take it, sir, that you mean to sail with us?"

"There doesn't appear to be anything else I can do."

"You're about right there. Well, let's shake hands on it."

I did so, deliberately ignoring both the others, and feeling my flesh twitch when I touched his flabby palm. Tuttle chewed savagely on the tobacco in his cheek.

"Damn the women!" he commented in sudden anger. "Better give the crew their breakfast, Anderson. Mr. Stephens, I've sent Dade into the cabin to attend things aft. He'll make a good hand at that sort o' job."

We passed out together into the bright sunlight on deck, and I remained in silence for a moment beside the rail, gazing forth across the empty sea. Had I done what was right in all these circumstances? Under God, I was not really certain; yet I could perceive no other action possible.

A slenderly built, stoop-shouldered young fellow, who shuffled about like a waiter ashore, was in the pantry, and I noticed a white cloth spread over the table, which had been lowered from its stanchions and now occupied the center of the main cabin, and a swinging shelf suspended above.

"Ever act in this capacity before, Dade?" I asked, sizing him up in the dim light.

"Oh, yes, sir," a slight lisp to his tongue; "I've done cabin work on the coast liners."

"Then you should surely understand your business. Lay covers for four."

"Four, sir?" in surprise.

"That is what I said, Dade; two ladies, Mr. Tuttle, and myself. That makes four to my figuring. Now step lively, my lad. When will breakfast be ready to serve?"

"In about 15 minutes, sir."

I waited until he became busy with his work, his face still filled with amazement over my revelation, then walked around the end of the piano, and rapped softly at the after-cabin door. Celeste opened the door with a dainty courtesy and a quick uplifting of frightened eyes to my face. She had been crying, and in some way her very manner made me suddenly aware how poorly I stood in the estimation of her mistress and herself. Yet, for the moment, I did not seriously care, stepping quietly within, cap in hand, intent merely on the rapid completion of my visit. Lady Darlington arose instantly from her chair, steadying herself to the roll of the vessel with one hand on the brass rail of the bed, and fronted me silently, the expression of her face expectant but reserved. Gazing upon her, I felt the fully revealed power of her beauty, as the sunlight streaming through the open port illumined her hair and outlined the delicate oval of her face. Troubled as she was, surrounded by a terror no less real because she failed thoroughly to comprehend it, facing one she must distrust and secretly fear, her first utterance, friendly and courteous, merely exhibited a heart which beat warmly beneath its slight armor of pride.

"I am exceedingly glad to greet you again, Mr. Stephens," she said, pleasantly, even endeavoring to smile; "you were absent so long we had begun to expect evil news."

"I regret to say, Lady Darlington, that I bring you only very little of any kind," I replied, striving earnestly to imitate her self-possession. "Arrangements on board have not yet assumed definite shape, so that I can make no promise concerning your future. I can merely assure you present safety, and pledge you every comfort the yacht affords while you remain with us."

She continued to gaze at me strangely, her eyes filled with questioning.

"Then you—you refuse to tell us our fate?"

"Merely because I do not know it. As I said before I am only one man pitted against 20."

She pressed her hand over her eyes, as though she would hide from me the sudden horror pictured within their depths.

"What are you?" she exclaimed, suddenly, her lips trembling. "Into whose hands have we fallen? I beg that you answer me honestly—why have you stolen this yacht? What real purpose underlies this terrible outrage?"

I made no effort to disguise the deep sympathy I felt for her, yet there was nothing I could answer but must have sounded both harsh and cruel.

"The motive animating the men in control is similar to that which renders possible most of the desperate deeds of the world—the search after treasure."

"Treasure!" she gasped, thoroughly bewildered. "Where do you propose going to search?"

"Far south, into the Antarctic."

The expression on her face was pitiful, yet I stood helpless to comfort.

"Merciful God! And you actually mean to bear us with you into that forsaken sea of ice? Oh, surely you jest, you seek to frighten; you cannot be earnest in such act of cruelty. Whom can I believe? What can I hope? You have told me you were the captain of this crew of buccaneers, and yet you say you can accomplish nothing with them to forward our release. Then take me to those who can! Let me beg upon my knees for mercy. Surely, surely we are of no value to you in your search after treasure. We are only weak, helpless women. Think of what this must mean to me, and be merciful."

There was no trace of tears in her eyes, but it was the white, agonized face, the unconsciously outspread arms of appeal, that smote me. I felt all my limbs tremble, my lips falter, as I made swift response.

"Lady Darlington, believe me, I have no desire except honestly to serve you. The actual truth is, I have consented to retain what is a purely nominal command of this vessel, with no other purpose except that such outward authority yields me some opportunity to assist and protect you. Otherwise I would spurn the whole affair and defy these outlaws to do their worst. It was a deplorable accident that brought me here and placed me in this situation. Practically I am as much a prisoner on board as yourself. Later, if the opportunity ever be given, I shall relate you my story, and then, perhaps, you will appreciate how perfectly helpless I am to overrule the decision of this vessel's crew. They are mad with the lust of gold, crazed by the prospect of suddenly achieving vast wealth through a single bold stroke. Would the tears of a woman influence them now? would the impotent threat of a single, helpless man? They are armed, organized, determined, desperate.

"Treasure!" She Gasped, "Where Do You Propose Going in Search?"

"The only thing I can do is apparently to yield to them, trusting thus to persuade them into some measure of mercy; and the only thing you can do is patiently to abide my efforts to release you from such companionship. I mean to do my best, even to the sacrifice of my life. The very thought of bearing you with us into the fogs and dangers of that storm-lashed ocean is misery to me. God knows I would do anything possible to spare you such a fate. But I wish you to understand, realize fully, how difficult my own position is. I do not bid you hope; only pray, and, above all, retain your courage. I promise nothing, because I dare venture no pledge. But I beseech you not to break down, not to exhibit open fear. In any event our first effort should be to awaken confidence in the minds of our captors, and arrive at a frank understanding between ourselves. Lady Darlington, will you be guided in this by my judgment?"

"Oh, I wish to believe," she sobbed, only half aloud, "I need some one, some one in whom I feel confidence, in whom I may repose faith. I beg of you not to consider me weak, a nerveless creature, but this situation is intolerable. I will endeavor to do what you ask. I will strive to be brave, helpful, appreciative. I—I think you are what you say. See, I give you my hand in promise."

I clasped it instantly within both my own, bending low above the white fingers, my lips set in firm resolve. I retained it still when I lifted my head, and our glances met.

"What is it you first desire of me?"

"Breakfast has been prepared, and is now awaiting us in the cabin," I answered, knowing well that some form of action must strengthen her more quickly than any further talk, "and I wish you to join us at the table exactly as though this was an ordinary voyage."

"I know the food will choke me. Does Celeste sit with us?"

"I believe you would prefer having her in the circumstances. You would not feel quite so much alone."

"I should like it; it was most thoughtful upon your part. Shall—shall we be alone at table?"

"With the exception of the first officer, who is really the leader on board."

It was evident plainly enough that she shrank from the ordeal, the delicate lines hardening about the mouth, the gray eyes eloquent of disinclination. A moment she hesitated, her form swaying as though buffeted by a storm; then she slowly bent her head.

"I am at your service, Mr. Stephens."

In the main cabin we discovered the table already set and waiting, appearing bright and cheery with a brave display of snowy cloth and glittering silver, the swinging shelf above adorned by bottles and gleaming glass.

"Call Mr. Tuttle, Dade," I ordered, quietly. "Then hurry back and serve."

CHAPTER XII.

In Which I Endeavor to Assert Authority.

I was on deck again at noon, and shot the sun, returning below to work out our position. The Sea Queen still held closely to her course, almost directly west, and, realizing my helplessness, I forebore asking useless questions. Indeed, I was secretly pleased that Tuttle still held to that point of the compass, for we were now in the direct path of Australian commerce, and hence much more likely to raise a sail at any moment than if we veered farther to the southward. If any such vessel appeared I had determined to pit my strength against the crew, even to the point of physical danger.

At one o'clock Dade called the women, and soon the four of us were seated at table again. My lady's manner weighed upon my spirits, which had been none of the lightest before her appearance. I felt profoundly that the faint influence my previous words had inspired within her mind had already evaporated; that she now held me as at one with the remainder of the yacht's crew. I arose as they retired from the table, but received no reward of recognition from her averted eyes. Feeling deserted, almost humiliated, I smoked my pipe alone on deck under the lee of the cabin. But it was perfectly useless loitering there, with no duties to perform, and the sea all about bare to the far horizon. Besides, some sailor instinct told me a storm was brewing yonder to the northward which might keep me upon the bridge all night, so, in preparation for such a possibility, I went below and lay down in my bunk. I was a long time getting asleep, finally dropping off only to be aroused by the rattling of dishes when Dade arranged the table for the last meal of the day.

De Nova was pacing the bridge and emerged from the companion. I could not see the seaman who hailed, the mist held so thick, and his words seemed like a weak echo.

"Sail, almost directly ahead, sir."

"W'ereaway?" asked De Nova, peering anxiously forward. "I can see nossing. Fo'c's'l' zare—you see ze ship?"

"Nothin' in sight from here, sir."

The mate stared up into the vapor overhead.

"Ware was it you see it, you fellow on ze foreyard?"

The odd echo of a voice came back out of the sky.

"I only caught her through a hole in the fog, sir, one point off the weather-bow."

With a swift bound I was up the steps to the bridge and beside the second officer, recklessly determined to assume command. Before he clearly realized my presence I jangled the bells in the engine room.

"Hold her steady as she is," I said sternly to the fellow grasping the wheel.

De Nova wheeled and faced me, his black eyes full of sudden anger.

"W'at ze hell you mean?" he exclaimed, so surprised he stuttered. "I was officer of ze deck."

"And I am commanding the yacht, Mr. De Nova," I retorted quickly, pushing back his hand from the signal, "I propose speaking that vessel yonder, and trans-shipping our passengers. Port a little, my man—no, port, you fool!—now hold her so; steady."

De Nova grasped my arm, his fingers like steel, but I broke away, pressing in between him and the rail.

"Lay your hands on me again," I threatened, sternly, "and I'll floor you to the deck. I'll take that grin off your face, De Nova, if you attempt any interference with me now."

He understood quickly enough what I meant, and evidently had no relish for attacking me alone, for with one swift, searching glance into the fog, he leaped down the steps and ran hastily aft. I knew he was seeking the backing of Tuttle, and armed myself with a belaying pin, peering eagerly meanwhile for the near-by sail, and cursing the fellow at the wheel for not holding her up to the point directed. They came up together, two steps at a time, Tuttle in his shirt sleeves, and, as they attained the bridge, Bill Anderson swung himself out of the hatch and started after them. I backed away, the ugly iron pin grasped in my hand.

"You'd better keep back," I warned, threateningly. "I'm ready to brain the first man who attempts to touch me."

Tuttle stopped, his jaw working savagely, his eyes on mine.

"Will you promise to keep quiet, sir, an' let us get away out o' this?"

"Damn you, no!" stubbornly, all my senses leaving me at sight of his hateful face. "I'll speak that ship yonder if I have to fight the crew of you single-handed."

"Then fight, you cockerel, an' be damned to you!" roared Anderson; and he pressed past the two of them and sprang at me.

It was hot, swift work, while it lasted. I struck twice, laying open the big brute's scalp, and dropping him so his head hung dangling down over the deck, his body huddled against the rail. I aimed to do as well by Tuttle, but the descending pin landed on his uplifted arm, and, before I could draw back for another blow, the fellow at the wheel released the spokes and jumped at my back, throttling me with his hands as the weight of his body crushed me to the planks. Grasping the rail I half tore myself loose, rising to one knee, and struck him twice madly in the face; but others of the crew came tumbling on top of us, pinning me helplessly down. It was all the work of a breathless moment, and as I lay there, the knee of a negro crunching into my chest, I saw De Nova spring to the wheel and whirl it hard down, while Tuttle, his left arm dangling, his teeth set from pain, began jangling the bells in the engine-room. Scarcely had the echo reached us when a strange voice hailed sharply from out the dense fog:

"Steamer, ahoy! What vessel is that?"

Tuttle's nasal voice answered:

"Steam yacht Cormorant, Panama to Easter island, for pleasure. Who are you?"

"H. M. S. Victory, on cruise. Stand by, while we send a boat."

A deep oath sprang to Tuttle's lips, his fingers convulsively gripping the rail. Then he appeared to rally, the very intensity of his fear making a new man out of him.

"Lively, lads, clear the deck," he commanded, harshly. "Here, one of you take the wheel. Now, De Nova, bundle that fighting fool down into the charthouse, and stand over him with a gun. Two of you fellows carry the boatswain into the fo'castle; lively, now."

They were certainly expeditious enough in my case, dragging me bumping down the steps, and flinging me in between table and bench with a violence that made me groan. I caught the glimmer of a steel barrel in De Nova's hand as he drew close the sliding door.

"It was not nice sing to do, Mons. Stephens," he said, not ill-naturedly, "but, by gar, out ze farsity row it was going to be done, for I shoot ze pistol very good."

"That's all right, De Nova," I replied, realizing my complete defeat and holding no personal grudge against him. "I don't blame you. I've made my play, and have had enough. May I sit up?"

He nodded carelessly, dropping the revolver back into his jacket pocket, yet with his black eyes fastened shrewdly on my face.

"'Tis ze bes' way to talk, monsieur," pausing to listen to the mingled sounds without. "Sacre, I wonder w'at ze devil was up now!"

We both sat, breathing hard from our late exertions, listening anxiously, yet with vastly differing emotions, hope animating me that this was to prove a capture, or, at least, that some chance discovery by the officer visiting us would result in the release of the women below. But De Nova was in an agony of apprehension, the full peril of his position clear before him. We heard the bare feet of the hurrying sailors patter along the deck, the strident voice of Tuttle issuing a few final commands, and the faint sound of oars in the water alongside. The officer came slowly up the ladder, and my heart sank as I heard him laugh carelessly to the mate's greeting. I could distinguish the sound of his voice, but not the words uttered, and in some way it impressed me with the thought that the fellow was young, a midshipman, possibly, who would prove mere putty under Tuttle's expert handling. The two went down the companion-steps together in apparently amiable conversation, and we could heard the low murmur of voices as the crew hung over the rail jesting with the men-o'-war's men in the boat below. My eyes met De Nova's in the semi-darkness, and he grinned, showing his teeth.

"Nossing ver' dangerous, monsieur," he said, easily. "Ze ol' fox he fool zat kid."

I attempted no response, my mind already sufficiently heavy from apprehension. Oh, for just a word, merely an opportunity to cry out our story before it was forever too late! De Nova must have felt the struggle within me, for he stretched his legs across the narrow passage leading to the door, and I saw his hand thrust into his coat pocket. Underneath his genial veneer he was one to act upon occasion.

1910 TO BE A PROSPERITY YEAR.

Harvesting Machinery Manager Says the Outlook is Very Promising.

Edwin D. Metcalfe, vice president and general manager of a large firm dealing in harvesting machinery, who is attending the annual convention of the Manufacturers' Association at the Waldorf, talked about the return of prosperity.

"It seems to me now", he sa "to depend on the harvest. If it is good, and at present there are no reasons why it should not be, look for a very big year in 1910 But, however well the crops turn out, the farmers will not be getting their money till next spring, and so it is likely to be next year before there is a return to the conditions which prevailed in 1906 and 1907.

"At the present moment there is however, one hopeful sign. Large buyers have arrived at the conclusion that prices have about reached the bottom, and are looking around to place large orders. Thus I heard of the United States Government the other day advertising for a year's supply of a certain class of goods. On the other hand, the manufactures are no anxious to sign contracts a long way ahead. They are expecting a rise in prices and are unwilling to bind themselves down. Business is just waiting for buyers and sellers to get together, and when that has been accomplished prosperity will come back.

"Of course the manufacturers are hanging back to see what the tariff will be. It does not matter so much whether it is the Payne bill or the Aldrich bill. Once the question is settled business will accomodate itself to the new rates

"I don't see why we should not have good crops. All the reports of winter wheat are good, and although in some parts of the Northwest spring sowing has been delayed by cold, there is still time to make it up. Anyhow, with the prices of cereals what they are there is sure to be an increase the acreage sown."

BRITISH NIGHTMARE.

There was a day in the not distant past when certain American newspapers were pointed to as the apothesis of all that was yellow The palm has now been transferred to British journals. Many of these appear to be moved by a disordered imaganation, the product of which are phantom flying machines from Germany, Germa Mausers stored in London cellars and an invading army of German barbers and waiters already on the spot and ready at a moment's notice to deliver the English over into the hands of the Kaiser American "yellows", in the palmiest days of their wildest flights were never so fertile in invention President Butler, of Columbia University, at the Lake Mohan peace conference, alluded to England's attitude toward German as a form of "present day emotional insanity." That is a most appropriate delineation, if the British newspapers reflect the general spirit.

England might as well give up and swear allegiance to Kaiser at once as to be kept in the constant state of nervous prostration. Sir John Barlow, a liberal member of parliment, has discovered that Germany has a depot arms containing 50,000 rifles and 7,500,000 rounds of ammunition established in London for supply of 50,000 German soldiers who are now masquerading peaceful workmen in the British metropolis. Others have seen mysterious German transport filled with troops enter the mouth the Humber, survey the possibilities for a landing and depart without being observed by the British men-of-war with which the North is dotted. Secretery of war Haldane is to be questioned in parliament concerning these things, and if he replies that he knows nothing about them, why it will simply prove that the secretary is not "in his job" and that will be fur cause for alarm. To keep up with the times in England a minister has got to dream dreams and see visions of German conquest. The British seem so confident that the Germans can whip them that it must be a great temptation to many to try it.

Money and Happiness Are Not Synonymous.

By JOHN BURROUGHS, Naturalist.

I DO not believe in the doctrine that if you want to make your wife happy all you have to do is to give her plenty of money. I do not believe that possession of money and happiness are synonymous. Women want LOVE FIRST OF ALL if they are provided with the right instincts.

The great problem of today is the making of money. It is unquestionably the occupation that engages the minds of the vast majority of people. But, from what I have seen of life and those leading it, WHEN ONE HAS OBTAINED A COMPETENCY MONEY IS SUPERFLUOUS, just like an excess of what is not needed to round out the figure and give it a handsome appearance.

PILING UP WEALTH THEN BECOMES LIKE PILING ON FLESH AND GREATLY HINDERS THE ENJOYMENT OF THE BEST THINGS OF THIS LIFE.

I know millionaires and know VERY FEW HAPPY ONES. True, Mr. Carnegie seems to be an exception because he is different from many other rich men. He is trying to get rid of his money, and he takes a keen delight in doing good with it.

But even when one disposes of wealth, if there is the consciousness that in acquiring it the weaker creatures have been overcome and saddened, I think there must be a TINGE OF REGRET in helping others with this very fruit that has been obtained at such cost.

MONEY, OF COURSE, IS NECESSARY TO PROVIDE THE COMFORTS OF EXISTENCE, BUT CULTURED PEOPLE—I SAY CULTURED PEOPLE, MIND YOU—CAN DOUBTLESS BE CONTENTED WITH BOOKS WHEN THEY CANNOT BUY AUTOMOBILES.

Orient Is Now Ready For American Commercial Advance.

By FRANCIS B. LOOMIS, Commissioner General of the United States to the Tokyo Exposition.

THE orient is now ripe and READY FOR AMERICAN COMMERCIAL ADVANCE by reason of the visit of the American fleet, that superb display of our power and efficiency.

American prestige in the orient has been raised to the highest level it has ever attained, and if the business men and the producers of this country do not take advantage of this RARE OPPORTUNITY the fault will be theirs and not that of the government, which has placed it before them.

We all desire to extend American commerce in the orient. We know that the markets there are the greatest potential markets in the world. But we cannot expect to establish ourselves in those markets if we deal churlishly with those people who should be the buyers and consumers of our products.

* * *

SO, AS A SIMPLE MATTER OF BUSINESS AND IN THE INTEREST OF INCREASED COMMERCIAL RELATIONS, IT BECOMES OUR SERIOUS DUTY TO EXERT EVERY ENERGY WE HAVE TO ENABLE THIS GOVERNMENT TO MAINTAIN JUST AND PEACEFUL RELATIONS WITH THE PEOPLE AND GOVERNMENT OF JAPAN. JAPAN HAS DONE HER PART.

America Should Set the Pace In Naval Matters.

By Rear Admiral ROBLEY D. EVANS, Retired.

THE twenty-six thousand ton type of battleship is the best investment our government could make, provided sixty caliber twelve inch guns are ready to go into it when it is finished. That sixty caliber twelve inch gun is the most powerful weapon in the world. There are no ships equipped with this kind of gun afloat today.

OUR POLICY SHOULD BE TO BUILD AHEAD OF THE OTHER NATIONS. WE SHOULD BUILD AHEAD OF EVERY OTHER COUNTRY BOTH IN GUNS AND IN SHIPS. WE SHOULD ALWAYS BE DESIGNING SHIPS AND GUNS FOR THE OTHER FELLOWS TO BUILD UP TO. INSTEAD OF THAT WE ARE HAVING THE PACE SET FOR US BY ENGLAND AND GERMANY, AND THEY ARE FORCING US TO BUILD UP TO THEM.

England can build her Dreadnoughts and put them into commission within a year. We should be in position to do that too. We have the best country on the earth, and we are the best people on the whole globe. We should SET THE PACE IN NAVAL MATTERS.

WE HAVE GOT THE BEST NAVY IN THE WORLD RIGHT NOW, BUT IT SHOULD BE MADE BETTER.

Deeds Which Mark The Captain of Industry.

By President WILLIAM DE WITT HYDE of Bowdoin College.

DO you anticipate large public wants and provide the means to satisfy them? Do you watch progress all over the world and apply methods and devices which succeed at one point at similar points elsewhere? CAN YOU MAKE TWO BLADES OF GRASS GROW WHERE ONE GREW BEFORE? Can you see clearly great undertakings before they are accomplished, calculate profit and loss, FILL OTHERS WITH THE VISION, induce them to share the cost in hope of profit and then make a good thing for them, a better for yourself and, the best of all, for the community you improve and serve? Then you are A CAPTAIN OF INDUSTRY, a man of enterprise, and your rank in the economic world is plus three.

THE POWER OF THE TONGUE

Sunday School Lesson for June 6, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—James 3:1-12. Memory verses 8-10.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Whoso keepeth his mouth and his tongue, keepeth his soul from troubles.—Prov. 21:23.

TIME.—It is believed the epistle was written between A. D. 40 and 50.

PLACE.—Believed to be at Jerusalem.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

Philosophers have striven to discover what faculty most clearly separates man from the brute; as, that man is the only animal that laughs, or the only animal that cooks, or the only animal that stands upright. Most thinkers, however, agree that the power of speech, with all that has grown out of it, is the clearest and most important distinction of mankind, and the surest indication of the superiority that God has conferred upon the human race. The passage we are to study is one of the finest in the Bible, and is the crown of all writings upon the subject.

Vs. 1, 2a. Why did James urge his readers not to be many masters (teachers, as in "schoolmasters")? I. Because the young church met that danger continually (see Acts 15:24; 1 Cor. 1:12; 14:26; Gal. 2:12). In the Jewish church the function of the rabbi was jealously guarded, but the liberty of prophesying (teaching) in Christianity was liable to become license. And "the more the idea prevailed that faith, without corresponding obedience, was all that is needful, the more men would eagerly press forward to teach."—Alford. This thought joins our present lesson with the last.

To illustrate perfect speech, to what does James compare the tongue? To a horse's bit or bridle, which, though small, turns and governs the whole body of the great animal; and, similarly, to a ship's helm or rudder, which, though so small in comparison with the great ship, and so weak in comparison with the fierce winds, yet turns the ship, in the face of the winds, whithersoever the governor (R. V. "steersman") listeth (R. V. "willeth"). Even so (like the bridle and the rudder) the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things, "vaunts great words, which bring about great acts of mischief."—Alford.

What is the point of the comparison? The power of the tongue in the guidance and direction of life—our own lives and those of others. And "we are never to forget that the 'tongue' includes the 'pen.'"—Deems.

What is the next comparison used by James? "The tongue—that world of of iniquity—is a fire, sprung from the fires of Gehenna. It is a little fire, to the eye; but a little fire can kindle a great forest. So the tongue can ruin the whole body—nay, the whole life, in its revolving course from the cradle to the grave." The tongue is called a world of iniquity because "all kinds of evil that are in the world are exhibited there in miniature."—Barnes.

What is the point of this comparison? It pictures the destructive power of the tongue, as the first two comparisons pictured the tongue's guiding power. Little words, mere puffs of air, are insignificant as small sparks; but as the flame and smoke may spread everywhere, so the baneful effect of evil speech may penetrate all life.

What is James' next comparison of the tongue? To an untamed beast; all other living things have been mastered by mankind—the four divisions of animals, according to James' rough zoology, namely, quadrupeds, birds, reptiles and fishes. But the tongue is an exception. No man can tame it; only God, who made it, can keep it under control. "It is an unruly (restless) evil, full of deadly poison," and so to be classed with the animals most hated and feared, the serpents.

What is the point of this comparison? As the first emphasized the guiding power of the tongue and the second its destructive power, so this comparison emphasizes its unrestrained power.

If the tongue cannot be tamed, are we to blame for our ungoverned speech? Yes, as James himself says (v. 10), "These things ought not so to be." "If we be truly Christ's, though 'reviled' by the unruly tongues of others, we shall, like him, 'revile not again' (1 Peter 2:23). And as the whole body is the Lord's to be sanctified to him (1 Cor. 6:19, 20), so particularly must the tongue be kept from 'evil-speaking, lying and slandering,' and used rightly for the service of God. Thus may we truly offer 'the calves of our lips' (Hos. 14:2), more acceptable than the blood of victims slain on a thousand altars."—Ellicott.

Why does James drop comparisons when he comes to his last point? Because there are no comparisons in nature to man's inconsistency in speech—only contrasts. The constancy of nature was as well known in James' day as in ours. But the tongue is sadly different! "Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing!"

What is the point of this contrast? Evil speech has been pictured as (1) influential, (2) destructive, (3) uncontrollable, and now finally as (4) unnatural. Men . . . are made after the similitude of God. "The nature of man is to adore God, and to love what is Godlike in man. Evil speech contradicts your nature and your destiny; to speak ill of others makes you a monster in God's world; get the habit of slander, and then there is not a stream which bubbles from the heart of nature, there is not a tree that silently brings forth its genial fruit in its appointed season, which does not rebuke.

Meshack Browning, Maryland's Greatest Hunter.

Mr. Roosevelt is a great hunter and a true sportsman—as great and true a man of sport as in the days when he roughed it in the West with no moving picture machine to preserve his prowess for posterity. But times have changed and hunting to him has become as mathematical and commonplace as talking with Mars is to Professor Lowell.

In view, however, of the reports that reach America of the former President's success with his rifle, it is interesting to compare them with the experiences—or a few of them—of a man who in his day was, perhaps, the world's greatest hunter, and who certainly for all time bears the palm of being Maryland's hunter de luxe.

DEFIED THE WILDERNESS

Browning Hunted Without Canned Goods or Press Agents.

In the days of Meshach Browning there was far more danger to a hunter from wild beasts in the the unsettled country stretching about the mountainous regions about the present towns of Cumberland and Oakland than there is today for the hunter upon the private shooting grounds of President Roosevelt's hosts.

Moreover, the hunter then sallied forth with just a few companions, or more often alone. He traveled over great stretches of country on foot. He had the instincts for following game of the Indians, and would tramp sometimes in his chase 15 or 20 or more miles.

When nights came on—winter nights and summer nights, but usually the former—he would have his choice of tramping home on foot, or else of camping where the chase had carried him.

This early hunter would sometimes build a fire on the hillside, in the very midst of the wilds, with only his two or three faithful dogs to guard him against surprises from wild beasts. He would sleep frequently in the open, or sheltered beneath a fallen tree while the ground about him was covered with snow.

When his means of making a light did not fail him, he could have a little campfire near by, although he was often denied this privilege. And he made a practice of the feeding to a large extent upon the game which had fallen, but a short while before, a prey to his prowess as a hunter.

This early hunter—this man who did not hunt as a means of recreation, but made it his profession, for sheer love of the sport, was of more use to society than any dandy-sportsman ever has been. He blazed the trail for more timid-hearted to follow, and he cleared the wild country westward of the greatest obstacles to the country's growth—the wild beasts that destroyed the settlers' stock and endangered their lives.

Of his adventures in the woods of Western Maryland, of his life as a hunter and that of his family and of his luck with the rifle, Browning left a book that has for nearly 50 years been one of of the chief, if not the chief, volume in the library of most residents of the western part of the State. But in the East his book with its tales of adventures is not well known.

The purpose of this introduction is simply to give a brief preface to a collection of excerpts from Browning's "Forty-four Years of the Life of a Hunter." These excerpts in themselves are dramatic enough to be interesting even to those who find no particular attraction in reading on hunting.

They are of interest because they reveal how great a revolution has been worked in the world within the years since Browning's death, for today the wildest parts of Africa present no dangers to the hunter at all comparable to those which existed in Maryland in the period from 1795 to 1839.

An acquaintance of Browning, in preparing a few words of preface for his book said: "It is impossible to state with accuracy how many of the denizens of the forest have fallen victims to his unerring rifle and deadly hunting knife; for he hunted regularly 44 years, and thus the greater portion of that time supplied his family, besides occasionally selling large quantities of venison and bear meat.

"He stated to me that, from the best estimate he could make, and from data considered reliable, he had killed from eighteen hundred to two thousand deer, from three to four hundred bears, about 50 panthers and catamounts (quite as ferocious, and not much less in size than the panther), with scores of wolves and wildcats."

And Browning speaking of his hunting himself said:

"Having made it a study for many years, it gave me an accurate knowledge of the disposition, habits, feeding-grounds, etc., of bears, and also of the hours of the day when they did feed; all of which it is necessary for a successful hunter, of either bears or deer to know.

"I began to hunt in 1795, and pursued the chase every fall till 1839—a period of 44 years—and in a country where game was exceedingly plenty. During this time, I think I found out as much about the nature and habits of the wild animals of the Alleganies as any other man, white, red, or black, who ever hunted in those regions."

Where a hunter had slain wild animals in such quantity it might be supposed that the chase quickly became commonplace to him, and that there was no large amount of excitement for the hunter. The following stories, however, combat any such conclusions:

AN 11-FOOT PANTHER

How Browning Bagged The Beast With Three Shots.

In another place Browning tells this story:

"Not long after we had settled in our new home there fell a light snow when I took my rifle and, calling a dog which I had brought with me from Wheeling, which was of the stock of old Mr. Caldwell's hunting dogs, I went into the woods after deer.

"I had not traveled far before I found the tracts of four deer, which had run off; for they had got wind of me, and dashed into a great thicket to hide themselves.

"I took the trail, and into the thicket I went, where I soon saw the deer running in different directions. I got between them, in hopes that I should see them trying to come togather again.

"I kept my stand perhaps five or six minutes, when I saw something slipping through the bushes, which I took to be one of the deer; but I soon found that it was coming toward me.

"I kept close look out for it; and directly, within 10 steps of me, up rose the head and shoulders of the largest panther that I ever saw, either before or since.

"He kept behind a large log that was near me, and looked over. But though I had never seen a wild one before, I knew the gentleman, and was rather afraid of him.

"I aimed my rifle at him as well as I could, he looking me full in the face; and when I fired he made a tremendous spring from me, and ran off through the brush and briers, with the dogs after him.

"As soon as I recovered a little from my fright, I loaded again, and started after them. I followed them as fast as I could, and soon found them at the foot of a large and very high rock; the panther, in his hurry, having sprung down the cleft of rock fifteen or twenty feet; but the dog, being afraid to venture so great a leap, ran round, and the two had met in a thick laural swamp, where they were fighting the best way they could, each trying to get the advantage of the other.

"I stood on the top of the rock over them, and aimed at the base of the panther's ear, when down he went; and I ran round the rock, with my tomahawk in hand, believing him to be dead.

"But when I got near him, I found he was up and fighting again, and consequently I had to hurry back for my gun, load it again, creep slyly up, take aim at his ear, as before, and give him another shot, which laid him dead on the ground.

"My first shot had broken his shoulder; the second pierced his ear, passing downward through his tongue; the last entered one ear, and came out at the other, scattering his brains all around.

"He measured 11 feet 3 inches from the end of his nose to the tip of his tail. This was the largest panther I ever killed, and I suppose I have killed at least 50 in my time."

HE MADE HUNTING PAY

Every Wolf Had to Pay for the Cattle it Killed.

The wolves which roamed through the wilds of Western Maryland frequently preyed upon the cattle of the few scattered settlers. Occasionally they got after Browning's stock.

"Having raised a little money," he says, "I laid it out in young cattle, and, there being scores of wolved about, on the same night that I got my cattle home I missed one yearling, which I found had been killed by a wolf. I told Mary (his wife) he should pay me for my calf; but she said she thought it was a bad debt.

"I took a shoulder of the calf, laid it in a running branch of water, and there set my steel trap; and on the third morning following I went to the place, and the trap was gone.

"Rain having fallen all night, every trace of the wolf's trail was destroyed. I returned home after hunting until I was tired, and got both dogs; but they could not scent him on account of the great rain.

"I knew that he would go to the nearest laurel swamp; to do which he had a creek to cross. I went into the middle of the creek and waded up it, till at last I discovered where the trap had stuck in the bank as the wolf was crossing the stream.

"I then followed the trail with great difficulty till it became fresher, when off went the dogs, and immediately they were on the old fellow in a hollow tree; and such fighting and cutting with teeth I never saw before or since.

"He was the largest and strongest wolf I ever met in my life. He remained in the tree, with his mouth wide open and every time a dog came within reach he would sink every tooth into him.

"I encouraged the dogs to make another set at him, when the strongest took a deep hold on one of the wolf's ears, while the other seized the remaining one.

"He then bounded from the tree and the two dogs threw him on the ground. He tried again and again to recover his feet, but they tumbled him down until they were all tired, when I took a club and beat him on the head until he was dead.

"I took off his scalp and hide, which were worth $9—the price of two calves. That was the way I served every bear and wolf. I always, to a certainty, took my own out of them for every trespass they made on me.

THE FIGHT WITH A BEAR

Seven Stab Wounds In One Square Foot Of Hide.

On one occasion Browning found a very choice hunting spot for bear, and succeeded in killing several.

"The following week," he says, "I took my two dogs and went to the same place, and sat on the identical log on which William and I had sat before, when in a short time I heard a bear pawing up the leaves in search of acorns.

"I had a blanket, with my bread and meat rolled up in it, which I laid down, told the dogs to stay by it and started in the direction of the noise.

"I soon discovered a very large bear, but as he was standing with his head toward me I was afraid to shoot him in the shoulder; the bones being so strong that a ball will not sink deep enough to kill him.

"I waited for him to turn his side toward me so that I could get at his heart, but while I was waiting one of the dogs left his place and came walking up to me, when I beckoned to him to lay down, and he stood still.

"I then looked for the bear, and finding that he was staring at myself and the dog I knew that he would make off. I shot at him in a hurry, when down he fell, and the two dogs sprang on him like mad tigers.

"The very worst kind of fighting then took place. I had one young dog which would seize the bear by the head but the latter always knocked him off, mashed him to the ground and bit him desperately.

"I ran up and shot the bear a second time, but too far back to kill him. When I fired the bear let the dog go, but as soon as he got loose he again seized the bear by the ear.

"The bear dashed him on the ground with one blow and was again biting him when I drew out my knife, and putting my thumb on the end of the handle, I held the blade behind, placed my eye on the spot where I knew I could send it to his heart, and, running past him, gave him a back-handed blow which sank the whole blade into his body.

"He let the dog go (which they will always do when a knife strikes them) but as soon as the dog got loose he again took the same hold.

"The bear threw him and bit him as before, when I again stabbed him; but in passing him the second time the bear made a grab at me, caught my right leg, tilted me over a fallen tree, and heels over head I went, his nails tearing out my pants a piece the size of his huge foot.

"The bear was in the act of springing on me when I fell; but the two faithful dogs, seeing my danger, seized him by the hams, and as he could not bear to have his breeches torn, he turned to defend himself.

"When I got up I found the same dog was down and the bear was again biting him. I repeated my thrusts with the knife, and thus relieved the dog; and so I continued to give one stab after another until I had driven the knife into him seven times.

"All these seven cuts were made in a space the size of a large dinner plate, four of them touching his heart and the others cutting his lights.

"Although it may appear improbable, yet it is none the less true that a hunter may steal on a bear and shoot him through the lungs, when he will die in three minutes; but if the dogs attack him he will live and fight for fifteen minutes, and perhaps longer, though wounded in the same manner.

"After I had given him the first five cuts he would let the dogs loose, and I suppose that he was then not sensible of his wounds.

"Seeing that he was still biting the dog severely and that I could effect nothing with the knife, I ran up suddenly, seized him by the wool on his hips and gave him a hard jerk, which, as he was very weak, threw him flat on the ground.

"He then gave a long groan, which was so like that of a human being that it made me feel as though I had been dealing foully with the bear beast; but there I had to stand and hear his heavy groans, which no person could have distinguished from those of a strong man in the last agonies of death."

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

NOTICE TO TAXPAYERS!

This is to notify the tax payers of Garrett county that the Annual Levy for 1904 has been made and published, and to call their attention to the following abstract Section 45, Chapter 596, Acts of 1900, relating to the discount to be allowed and the interest to be charged on all tax bills.

"All county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of the levy thereof, and on all county taxes paid on or before the 1st day of September a discount of 3 per cent. will be allowed, and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid. The Treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the tax bills for count purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt given for taxes so paid. But the discount shall not be allowed unless the whole amount of state and county are paid when same is made.

"1892" Pure Aluminum Ware

Will Not Rust, Crack, Break, Scorch or Burn

Cheapest Because Best — Will Last a Lifetime

HERE, at last, is the ideal kitchen and cooking utensil—"THE WARE THAT WEARS"—made from Pure Spun Aluminum, and guaranteed by the makers to last 25 years with average usage. "Spun" Aluminum, mind you, not cast Aluminum, which will sometimes crack and scale. Spun Aluminum Ware will never crack, peel, scale or break.

Costs a trifle more than ordinary enamel ware, but is many times cheaper in the long run, because of its wonderful durability and fuel saving. Enamel ware is iron coated with colored glass. Iron expands with heat. Colored glass does not, but chips off into the food with dangerous results to those who eat it.

That the use of enamel kitchen ware causes cancer is a view held by some eminent medical authorities. Dr. William H. Diefanbach of New York, in a paper entitled "Observations on the Etiology of Cancer," read before the Bureau of Sanitary Science and Public Health during the session of the International Homeopathic Congress at Atlantic City, discussed this subject.

According to a special dispatch to the Philadelphia North American, Dr. Diefanbach advanced the argument that chipping of the hard-coated dishes used in preparation of meals allowed minute but dangerous particles of foreign matter to become mixed with the food, these being taken into the stomach, where the cancerous growth is caused by abrasions which they make in the walls of the organ.

"1892" Pure Aluminum Ware saves doctors' bills. It enables you to bake bread, pies, pan cakes, etc., without grease, which is the great cause of dyspepsia and indigestion. Aluminum griddles require no grease; hence are smokeless and odorless.

"1892" Pure Aluminum Ware will not scorch or burn, is easily cleaned, will not rust, or corrode. Handsome in appearance. Looks like silver, but weighs only about one-fourth as much, and is light and convenient to handle.

The original and only genuine Spun Aluminum Ware is made by the Illinois Pure Aluminum Co. at Lemont, Ill. Every piece bearing their trade-mark, the Maltese Cross, and marked "1892" Pure Aluminum Ware is absolutely pure, wholesome and hygienic, and guaranteed for 25 years.

See that you get the right goods and accept no substitute.

NEW YORK MAGAZINE MEN WILL VISIT GARRETT

Thirty Brilliant Writers To Spend Sunday On the Mountain Top.

As guests of the West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company, Luke, Allegany county, Maryland, a party composed of thirty New York magazine owners and writers will visit Garrett county on Saturday of this week, coming to Mountain Lake Park in a private car attatched to the 7.25 o'clock evening accomodation, where they will be dined at the Mountain Lake Hotel, along with a number of invited guests from Oakland including those associated locally in the management of the Park and the Oakland newspaper men, besides members of the Board of Trade, who will also act, in connection with the Mountain Lake Park Association officials, as a reception committee.

At the hotel an elaborate menu will be served by Manager Dunnington and a program of speechmaking will be carried out.

On Sunday the visitors will go to Conneway's tower where they will spend the day, returning to the Park early enough in the afternoon to have supper and leave on train No. 12 for the east the same night.

DEER PARK.

Deer Park is constantly improving. Mayor Hennen is alert to all its needs and is lending practical aid. Sometime ago he began a system of road improvements to driveways leading into the town, using cinders. This was of great benefit, but he is now using broken stone and with good effect. Mayor Hennen's plan is to spread the stone entirely across the roadway, laying it compactly on the ground. He is aided in this work by the members of the Town Council.

Mrs. Elmer Haulenbeek is again at her summer home near Deer Park. She returned from St. Luke's Hospital, Baltimore City, last week. Dr. E. Z. Cole performed an operation, and Mrs. Haulenbeek is rapidly gaining her usual good health. She speaks in high terms of St. Luke's Hospital and its corps of physicians and trained nurses.

Mrs. S. F. Cole, of Mt. Royal Ave., Baltimore, is visiting at "Uplands" near Deer Park.

A Burning Question.

How often has the Journal sold, rented, leased or otherwise disposed of the Oakland Hotel this spring for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company?

DISSOLUTION CAME WHILE HE SLEPT.

Sudden Death of a Prominent Railroad Engineer.

John C. Teets, a Baltimore & Ohio Railroud engineer whose home was at Lake Ford, Garrett county, was found dead in his room at his boarding house at Rowlesburg, last Sunday. His run was on a helper between Rowlesberg and Terra Alta. On Sunday morning after his night's work was done he retired as usual about 9 o'clock. He was called at the dinner hour and replied that he would arise immediately, but did not appear at the dinner table. His boarding mistress, Mrs. Wilson, thinking he desired a longer rest did not disturb him until supper time when it was discovered that the popular engineer was dead. He seemed to have passed away very peacefully as his bed clothes were not disarranged. Heart trouble was given as cause of his death.

Mr. Teets was 36 years, 8 months and 11 days old. He had been on the railroad nearly nine years and had run an engine for more than five years. He was an active member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and was a very highly respected and popular man. He is survived by his wife and six children. His wife was visiting friends in Terra Alta when the news of her husband's death reached her and she went at once to Rowlesburg and had the body brought to Mr. A. S. Sypolts an uncle of Mrs. Teets, at Terra Alta. On Tuesday the funeral was held in the M. E. church and was conducted by the Rev. P. S. Strader, in the absence of the Rev. Mr. Engle who was at conference. He was laid to rest in the Terra Alta cemetery. The burial services were conducted by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. So ends a life of many sterling qualities.

"Keeley" For Money Indictable.

The last grand jury for Allegany county indicted James Kenney, Philip F. Blake and Samuel Jackson for keeping a gambling table other than a billiard table, on which the game of "Keeley" was played. The defense contended that the game did not come within the meaning of the gambling law, in that it required skill to win. While Judge Boyd, who has just rendered his decision, found the men not guilty, he stated that the parties could be indicted for keeping a gambling place as it was a violation clearly of the law to play the game for money.

Indicted For Lynching.

Among the indictments found by the grand jury at Elkins, W. Va., were indictments against Andrew Hedrick, Webster Cross and James Kenney, for being connected with the lynching of Joe Brown, at Whitmer, W. Va., on March 19. It is considered very doubtful that the men can be convicted.

OAKLAND BUSINESS MEN GIVE "BOOSTER DINNER"

Upwards of Seventy Gathered About Festive Board Last Thursday Night.

Last Thursday night, June 3rd, more than sixty of the business men of Oakland and vicinity sat down to dinner at the Frantz Hotel. The dinner and this gathering of the business men was unique in that it was the first of the kind ever held in Oakland, and every one was present with one intention—boosting the county of Garrett generally and the town of Oakland particularly.

The idea of such a gathering originated with Lieut. E. S. West, whose motto, "Boost, Don't Knock," met with universal approval and resulted in the gathering together around the festive board of this number of progressive, boosting citizens. The menu consisted of fried chicken, ham, potato salad, cold slaw, pickles, strawberries with cream, cake, coffee and cigars.

After dinner Lieut. West introduced Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill as the toastmaster. Mr. Hamill prefaced his remarks by saying, "Time, if taken at the tide, leads to fortune," and Garrett county was just approaching the hightide of prosperity; the county seat, Oakland, with the installation of water, sewerage and natural gas, and intersected by the great state highway, was the best summer resort in the United States. The toastmaster then introduced Mr. E. H. Sincell, who spoke of the resources of Garrett county.

Mr. Sincell is familiar with nearly every foot of Garrett county and consequently well qualified to speak of its natural advantages. He called attention to the fact that cutting out the timber, while sometimes looked upon as being unfortunate, was in realty a blessing, as it was opening up one of the most fertile and productive farming sections within the bounds of Maryland. He directed attention to the fact that this county has the largest wheat field in the State and that we have two hundred and fifty square miles of coal lands—good coal—and if properly handled it would be a source of revenue, not only to the present owners but their children's children also. Eight coal mines Mr. Sincell continued, are now in active operation along the line of the Western Maryland Railroad—all money makers, and this condition would result with undeveloped lands as well when they are placed upon the market. He directed attention to the vast quantities of fire clay, kaolin, some iron ore and other minerals to be found in the county, closing his remarks by saying that in a few years the eyes of Maryland would be turned to Garrett county as not only the largest but the wealthiest and most progresssive in the State.

The toastmaster, Mr. Hamill, before introducing the next speaker, called attion to the fact that an option had been taken on the water power along the Youghiogheny river and that it was only a question of a short time until the vast power now going to waste would be harnessed and made to serve man in heating and lighting his dwelling, turning the wheels of industries and adding in other ways to the comforts now found only in the most populous centres. Mr. Hamill then introduced State's Attorney Julius C. Renninger, who made an able address on "What We Need." He very aptly illustrated the one great need by a story of a stranger going along a country road and seeing a sign "This Farm for Sail." Seeing the owner of the farm in a field nearby, he asked him when he thought the farm would sail, and the answer came instantly, "as soon as somebody comes along who can raise the wind." He thought that an earnest concentrated effort to interest capital would have the desired result; that instead of shipping great quantities of glass sand out of the county, we could get glass factories located here, and that a railroad along the Yough river connecting Oakland with Pittsburg was one of the possibilities of the near future.

Mr. Scott T. Jones was the next speaker and he gave an interesting talk on "How We Should Treat Our Visitors." He said this subject should have been: "How We Should Treat Non-Residents WhoCome to Our Town", and that every visitor should receive such courteous treatment that they would carry away a pleasant recollection of the town and its residents. He advised the people to carry this idea into their business dealings and give our summer visitors fair prices so that they could live here as cheaply as at their homes. Mr. Jones proved conclusively that Oakland was the best market for country produce along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Mr. G. Semmes Hhmill was introduced and handled the subject, "Boost, Don't Knock," intelligently. He has always been a booster and his talk proved that he is still in favorof progress.

Dr. W. W. Davis, superintendent of Mountain Lake Park, called attention to the fact that one of Oakland's best assets was Mountain Lake Park. He said that Oakland and Mountain Lake Park working together would share in each other's progress, and with the best climate in the United States would hold a place second to none as summer resorts.

Following Dr. Davis' talk, Mr. T. J. Peddicord was introduced by the toastmaster, who referred to him as the nestor of the Garrett county bar. Mr. Peddicord has always been one of our most eloquent and interesting talkers, and his subject, "How It Can Be Attained," was heard with a great deal of pleasure. He said we had resources and if we worked together to let it be known these resources would find development, but thought the greatest development would be as a farming community.

Short addresses were also made by Messrs. Fred. A. Thayer and William R. Offutt, and a vote of thanks was proposed for Lieut. West as the father of the suggestion to get together and discuss ways and means of helping Garrett county. Lieut. West being a modest man declined to have this subject discussed at length, but suggested that a subscription be taken to provide funds with which to advertise Oakland and Garrett county and their rescoures and it was the work of a few moments until nearly $250 had been raised for this purpose.

After some discussion regarding a celebration on Independence Day the guests departed.

The dinner was a success from every standpoint and a great deal was accomplished, and it is hoped that this will not be the last gathering of the kind. Let the people get together and boost our county. The Board of Trade of Oakland is doing all it can and needs the support of every citizen of the county to aid in the good cause

Mrs. Mason Badly Hurt.

Mrs. John W. Mason, wife of Judge Mason, of Fairmont, W. Va., suffered severe injuries from a fall at about 2 o'clock Saturday afternoon.

Mrs. Mason was visiting friends and tripped and fell down a flight of stairs. She was removed to her own home and given medical attention.

She was found to be suffering greatly and while the full extent of the injuries have not yet been ascertained, she is reported to be in a very serious condition. Judge Mason adjourned court as soon as news of the accident to his wife was broken to him and he is now at her bedside.

HOT SHOT FOR HIS HIGHNESS THE GOVERNOR

State's Attorney J. Frank Turner Defies Him and Questions His Sincerity.

States' Attorney J. Frank Turner, a Democrat, of Easton, has sent a very tart letter to Governor Crothers in reply to the Covernor's recent letter advising him to give up either the State's Attorneyship for Talbot county or the chairmanship of the Democratic State Central Committee for the county. He declines to do either, and points out that the Governor himself, Attorney-General Straus, State Treasurer Vandiver, Comptroller Hering and other State officials hold more than one office. He also accuses the Governor of lack of sincerity. He says, in part:

After your disclaimer to me in the presence of Hon. Joshua W. Miles that you had any knowledge of the effort being made to have me put off the committee for my county, I accepted your declaration, which was made to me voluntarily and unsolicited, in good faith, and then and there told you that I had given you credit for having too much legal sense to be engaged in any such business. But when I received your letter I must confess that I was not only disappointed and my confidence in your sincerity shaken, but I was really grieved that one holding the high and exalted position that you do in the councils of the State and of my party should be willing to lend himself to such a cause.

To show you how ridiculous is the contention of the Attorney-General, and how absurd is the proposition which you have undertaken to uphold, let me illustrate.

You are Governor of Maryland, and it is your duty under the Constitution to take care that laws are executed. Now you are also chief of the State Road Commission in this State. Can Austin L. Crothers, Governor, enforce the laws against Austin L. Crothers, road builder? Now it is very important to the people of the State, irrespective of party, that the State roads should be built. The law for their construction was passed more than a year ago. So far no roads have been built, and yet it is too much for the people to ask or expect you to issue a mandate against yourself to proceed without further delay with this important work. And no one would ask you, notwithstanding this apparent incompatibility, and where you are in fact and truth holding two offices created under the Constitution and laws of the State and directly under the State government, to resign either the office of Governor or as chief road builder of the State.

If you will look over the State you can find enough illustrations of this character to fill a volume. There is the State Treasurer, who is the chairman of the State Central Committee, and at the same time he is director of a dozen banks or more. There is the Comptroller of the State Treasury, who is also cashier of a bank in Westminster, Md. And all three of you gentlemen are members of the Board of Public Works, members of the board of directors for the House of Correction and members of the board of directors of the Maryland Agricultural College and other institutions.

There is the Attorney-General, who is the legal adviser for the executive officers of the State, and he is also the legal adviser for the chief executive committee of the Democratic party. What possible chance would any man have in getting an opinion in his favor from this law officer of the State upon any question of this character if it did not meet the approval of the chairman of the State committee? Here is incompatibility with a vengeance! The Attorney-General might be as pure and unsullied as the angles of Heaven, but no opinion which he might give under the conditions I have named would carry any weight or inspire any confidence in its truth and impartiality in the minds and hearts of the people of this State.

I knew that an effort was on foot to get me out of the committee. But how to do it, that was the question. It was at first thought I would be cajoled into submitting the question to you or Murry Vandiver. That was the proposition made to me by the Attorney-General on April 28 at the Eutaw House, in Baltimore city. He called me his friend, and for fear I would not believe him he went to a gentleman from Talbot county, who he knew was my friend, and told him how much he thought of me. "That man Turner is a nice fellow; I like him," said Mr. Straus. But I had heard too much too much to be caught with that kind of chaff and declined his offer. The trap was set and baited with honeyed words, but the bird did not decoy. Being thus foiled in his plan, the Attorney-General then threw off all disguise and went after me with "hammer and tongs" in the press of Baltimore city. I was held up to the people of the State by this officer as some great offender who was defying the authorities of the State and upon whom he was trving to fasten the clutches of the law.

All this was done in order to frighten me. But instead of that the antics the Attorney-General has been playing in this matter only makes him appear the more ridiculous, until he has become the laughing stock of the bar of the State. And when it was found that I could neither be cajoled nor scared, then your authority was invoked and your mandate in this matter, allow me to suggest, has no more authority and is supported by no more law than a ukase from the Czar of all the Russias.

"The people of the State are wondering why I am so determined to remain upon a committee, when the Attorney-General and the Governor of the State have declared it to be illegal for me to remain. To enlighten them I will say, what is not news to you, that I happen to be one of a committee that governs the organization of my party in Talbot county, and it was desirable for certain purposes that the control of this committee should be changed. Had I resigned the chairmanship of the committee the primary election now about to take place in Talbot county would have been called upon the old convention plan, direct voting for nominations would have been denied the people and men would have been nominated as candidates that now dare not face the voters.

Again, had I resigned, it would have been an absolute surrender of the control and management of the party here in the county against my friends, who have for years given me their support. It would have been selling my friends out, in order that I might have the office of State's attorney, when my friends here all knew that had the office of State's Attorney been offered me on condition that I would resign from the committee, I would have declined the honor.

Believing that the contention of the Attorney-General is unsupported by law, and that your action in the premises is without authority, I shall continue to perform the duties of the office of State's Attorney for Talbot county and at the same time act as chairman of my party committee for the remainder of the term for which I was appointed.

Converted Section of West Virginia Into "Dry Territory"

The action of the county court of Mineral county at Keyser, Monday declining to grant liquor licenses to the seventeen applicants whose petitions were recommended by the city councils of Piedmont and Keyser, has occasioned no end of comment and interest there. The county court which is composed of Judges Bishoff, Cross and Dayton, was confronted with two petitions, one of 1050 signers opposing license and the other of some 500 signatures favorable to license. In addition to these petitions, able attorneys represented each side to the controversy. Under the West Virginia liquor law, the granting of licenses rests in the discretion and judgment of the county court and from its decision there is no appeal. Each of the seventeen applicants, ten from Piedmont and seven from Keyser, endorsed individually by their respective city councils as fit persons to receive license, received separate and distinct consideration at the hands of the court, but the verdict was the same in every case—no license. This condition will likely prevail for at least two years, as during that period the present personnel of the court will continue in force and power.

Through this act of the court, the state loses in annual revenue $17,000, while the loss to Piedmont is $1,500 and to Keyser, $7,700, where the city license and costs alone amount to $1,100 for each applicant.

Condemns Church Prizes.

Declaring card playing for prizes makes the home a recruiting station for the gambling den, and scathingly arraigning the modern dance, Rev. Rufus A. Finnell scored modern society amusements in a sermon at the Island Christtain Church at Wheeling W. Va.

He said the gambler who plays in the dive is more repectable than the gambler who plays in the parlor, and that both ought to be arrested.

"The church has no right," he said, "to condemn professional gambling, and allow its members to play for dinky cream pitchers and cut glass dishes."

Mr. Finnell's congregation is one of the most fashionable in the city.
